Mr. Chairman, recently Mr. Perry, chief of the Nebraska Department of Information and Education, found the shelterbelts in my district a real refuge for birds and wildlife. He stated that during one trip in midwinter in 18 shelterbelts in the Neligh district, 121 pheasants, 25 prairie chickens, and 2 quail were counted. Only one of those belts was planted in 1935, the others being planted in 1937 or later. A flock of 200 sharp-tailed grouse are usually to be found in the Ferdinand Sirdler, Charles Murphy, or Thomas Putman shelterbelts in Box Butte County, a part of our Alliance district. In 21 shelterbelts in the Alliance district, all planted since 1937, 485 pheasants and 125 other small birds, in addition to the sharp-tailed grouse, were counted. An unusually large number of birds and animals were seen in shelterbelts in the Kearney district, especially in Custer and Logan Counties. Although exact counts were not made, the birds seen included large numbers of pheasants, 100 or more sharp-tailed grouse, and numerous prairie chickens. On the Glen Vieimeyer farm, 4 miles north of Stapleton, 13 of the 14 chukar partridges "planted" on the farm were found enjoying the cover and food provided by the shelterbelt, and Adolph Hamm, district agent of the Bureau of Biological Survey, of Cheyenne, Wyo., estimated there were 200 pheasants in another shelterbelt planting on this same farm. In the Columbus district, the oldest plantings are 1 year old, but, even so, remains of birds' nests were found, and pheasants were numerous in these plantings that contained a row or two of sorghum of corn.

During the hunting season, Aubrey J. Arthurs and a Mr. Stevenson went through the Susie Gettinger belt after hunters had been through that territory. The birds hid in this 1937 shelterbelt as soon as the hunters' guns were heard, and they were extremely hard to flush out since they could keep well hidden. Another day, cold and windy, few birds were found in the open fields, but they were plentiful in the shelterbelts. Mr. Barker, who has a 1939 shelterbelt in Antelope County, commented that the older shelterbelts were being used extensively as hiding places during the hunting season. It was his opinion that outsiders should not be allowed to hunt in them.

Smaller birds, such as brown thrashers, woodpeckers, bluejays, robins, meadowlarks, blackbirds, orioles, swallows, sparrows, catbirds, and others through the shelterbelts in summertime. Many of the cooperators feel that the number of birds is increasing in the areas where shelterbelts have been planted extensively, and the farmers believe this increase in birds will reduce grasshopper and insect damage in future years.

The nearest thing to an actual survey, which gives positive evidence of the bird population in shelterbelts, was made in the Mangum, Okla., district last December. At that time the nests in 19 shelterbelts were counted. Two of the belts were planted in 1935, 10 in 1936, and 7 in 1937. The count showed a total of 849 nests, of which 256 were in the osage-orange trees and 213 in the Chinese elms. Since you are familiar with that country, a study of the report may be interesting to you and I am enclosing a copy of it with this letter. In the El Reno district, notations of quail found in 12 shelterbelts were made during the cultivation period. Five of these belts were planted in 1938 and 7 in 1939, yet 18 coveys totalling between 250 and 275 quail were utilizing the plantings. Late in summer, State Director Nelson made a count in the A. H. Bungardt shelterbelt in Washita County and found 60 dove nests, 21 mocking-bird nests, 1 quail nest, and 36 nests which he did not classify. One covey of quail, consisting of about 25 birds, was also observed.

One of the interesting things about this situation in the South is the fact that farmers claim that quail are beginning to reappear in some cases where they were supposed to have been extinct for some years.

In all districts there are many indications that wildlife is making increased use of the shelterbelts. Badgers, coyotes, foxes, squirrels, and other small fur bearers are moving in, while rabbits and other rodents are helping to make up that wildlife community, characteristic of forested areas.

There are many reasons why this program should be made permanent in order that the Forest Service can be given an opportunity to continue it under its present high-type method. Mr. Paul Roberts, of the Forest Service, has administered this program in the Plains States in a very high state of efficiency and economy. I am happy to report to this House that I have made a personal investigation of the work done by his Department in my district, and I have nothing but praise for the work of the Service from the farmers in my district. In every locality where these trees have been planted I find the farmers and towns people in favor of continuance. In discussing these matters with those in charge, I find several reasons why some changes in policies and rules should be adopted. Here are a few reasons:

The emergency-relief legislation stipulates definite ratio limitations between employment of certified and noncertified personnel. This is 90 certified to 10 noncertified. It is necessary, therefore, at all times to keep employment of labor up to a minimum of 90 percent. The work is seasonal in character, but even during slack labor periods it is necessary to keep employment up to maintain a technical and supervisory organization to arrange with farmers for planting, examination of the areas to be planted, and determine kinds of trees for each area and other work.

The funds for the work are frozen by States. Weather conditions, drought, and other local problems often make interstate adjustments necessary to the efficient conduct of the work.

There is no provision in the legislation allowing the employment of noncertified and nonsupervisory personnel payable from project funds. Often essential, nonsupervisory, facilitating personnel, such as stenographers, clerks, truck drivers, and so forth, are unobtainable from relief rolls. Inability to employ such personnel seriously hampers efficient conduct of the work.

The E. R. A. legislation for the fiscal year 1940 limits the money available for purposes other than salaries and wages in any State to $6 per man-month of employment. This amount is inadequate to meet expenses necessary to the conduct of the work, for rents, supplies, operation of trucks and other motor equipment, purchases of necessary equipment, travel, and other necessary expenses. [Applause.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the consideration of this War Department appropriation bill, may I bring to the attention of the Committee the large allocation of money that has been made in past years and this year to the War Department from relief appropriations. I have just obtained these figures from the Treasury.

Since April 8, 1935, the Army has been allocated $91,703,350, and the Army engineers have been allocated during the same period $163,453,405. We note that the allocations to the Army engineers were for the purpose of flood control and for big work projects throughout the country.

For the fiscal year which will close in June of this year there has been allocated to the Army, $11,166,395. In making this vast appropriation of $785,000,000 for the Army, I think it is well to consider the additional amount that has been taken from relief appropriations and made available for expenditure by the Army.

I would like to call attention to another thing in the remaining few minutes of my time. We hear a great deal about our national defense and the importance of protecting the Isthmus of Panama and the Panama Canal. I believe that subject has been mentioned here by several Members this afternoon. Our President has recently gone through the Panama Canal, as we all know. But there is something about the Panama Canal that I as a layman cannot quite understand.

When I go to Panama, that narrow isthmus some 30 miles wide crossed by the Panama Canal, passage through whose locks takes 8 hours, and crossed by a railroad. I find no other means of transportation from one side of the isthmus to the other. I wonder why it is that with vital defenses on the Pacific side and on the Atlantic side of the isthmus there is no highway between these defenses. As I look at the little winding railroad running on a little green grassy strip through Gatun Lake and realize that one bomb properly placed would put the railroad out of commission, I wonder what steps could be taken in case of an emergency to bring defense forces from one side of the isthmus to the other if the railroad were out of commission, if it takes 8 hours to get a ship through the Canal, and when there is an impenetrable jungle between the two defense forces. What would be the policy of the Government in such a situation?

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. STEFAN. I am very much interested in this question in view of the fact that I have traveled through the Canal several times. The gentleman was also there recently, I understand. Did the gentleman make any inquiry as to why some kind of a highway across the isthmus has not been started?

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I have asked responsible persons a number of times but have received no satisfactory answer. The only thing I can understand is that they have a little monopoly down there in the Panama Railroad. With automobiles teeming on both sides of the isthmus, the only way you can get automobiles from one side to the other is to ship them across by train. I am not interested in a monopoly, I am interested in defending this vital Canal, on which we must depend to get our ships from one ocean to the other.

Mr. STEFAN. Did the gentleman inquire whether or not it would be feasible to build a highway from Colon across to the other side? Has the gentleman asked any of the engineers whether or not there is something there that would prevent the building of such a highway?

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I have had a look at the country from an airplane and, if I am competent to judge the terrain there, it would be very easy to build a road across the isthmus there. I do not know why there is no connection between the two sides. I am wondering what our forces would do in case of an emergency, if, for instance, one side of the Canal were attacked and it was desired to bring forces across the isthmus from the other side. [Applause.]

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CLEVENGER].

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Chairman, I, for one, am unwilling to see continued the practice of making guinea pigs out of Ohio farmers. In former times they used to have some of the rich along with the poor—a streak of fat and a streak of lean, so to speak. Now they have to take all the lean. Under the traditional American system, agriculture cannot possibly be prosperous with the farmers continually having to guess what their program ought to be, while, at the same time, they have to continue to guess against the hazards of weather and the hazards of markets, the hazards of pests and the hazards of price. Heaven knows the farm business was filled with enough natural hazards to beset the good folk of the soil, without adding these extra hazards of having to guess at a continually changing, contradictory, and inconsistent political paternalistic policy.

Under present conditions, if the Secretary of Agriculture, the pivotal point in the fortunes of the farmer under the New Deal system—if the Secretary of Agriculture, I say, guesses wrongly, everyone has made a wrong guess. One of these wrong guesses cost the American farmers their export cotton business and encouraged the setting up of permanent production in other lands; now we penalize all agriculture to pay for that wrong guess.

We are asked to pass a Farm Credit Act to siphon all farm loans into one agency. That agency would be an adjunct to the Department of Agriculture. I am unwilling, Mr. Chairman, to put the necks of Ohio farmers into that stanchion. Ohio farmers are able farmers. They are courageous farmers. They are resourceful farmers. But even the most powerful herd bull is helpless in a stanchion. I do not want to see the farmers of my State herded into a managed group, a body controlled completely and arbitrarily by departmental bureaucrats.

American agriculture is getting about as fat and strong under Mr. Wallace's policies and control as a dairy cow grazing in a dust-bowl pasture. If we are to save the American farmers, we must eliminate these New Deal theories and get down to practical economics. We must eliminate irresponsible experimentation and get down to the old-fashioned common sense that has enabled the farmers in America to carry on for these 150 years and to establish the richest, most prosperous agriculture the world ever knew.

We will not restore agriculture with reciprocal-trade treaties that expose our farmers to importations of tropical oils which will crowd our lard from its natural market. We will not save the American farmer by the methods which have increased the trickle of 18,000 imported cattle in 1934 into the torrent of 759,000 imported cattle in 1939. If this sort of thing goes on, the American farmers will eventually have to join the W. P. A. workers and others dependent upon official favor and the whims of bureaucrats for the right to exist.

It would be questionable whether or not we ought even temporarily to submit to a surrender of civil and political liberties even if the benefits were very great and very sure. There is all too much of this trend in the Government at Washington toward rendering the American farmer subservient to the favors and the dictates of the puppets of a political autocracy. We have before us the scandalous and startling example of the National Labor Relations Board arrogating to itself the right to pass on loans made to business by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Other bureaus, other agencies dispensing favors at the expense of the taxpayers' pocketbook have been invited by the National Labor Relations Board to cooperate with it in compelling business institutions to comply with what? The law? No, Mr. Chairman; not the law; to comply with the bureaucratic edicts of petty officials who have never submitted themselves to the approval or the disapproval of the voters.

Everywhere throughout the administration, in every State, in every county, every city, every village, every mountain settlement, up every creek and hollow we find this idea of enforced compliance with the manifestos of bureaucrats, the regulations of some department or another. We find the idea of assessing penalties for disobedience to these gentlemen in Washington who try to justify their secrecy of operations under the euphonious term of a "passion for anonymity." Why do they want to be anonymous? Because they do not want the American taxpayer to know what they are doing with the public money; because they do not want the American voters to know what a stupendous, solidly entrenched, and greedy bureaucracy has been created in the Capital of these United States; because they do not want the American people to realize how far away from free constitutional government, how far away from the liberties and the privileges guaranteed to the citizens under the Bill of Rights this administration has carried this Nation. If this be the price of planned economy, I want none of it for my people. Such a planned economy is un-American, and, if tolerated, will inevitably bring to this Nation a system of fascistic control that will make the American people rue the day they ever turned a willing ear to the siren song of the New Deal.

Annually recurring deficits and a national debt bloated to the proportions of a major menace to the security of this country are eloquent testimony to the approach of either repudiation, uncontrollable inflation, or national bankruptcy. Of course, national bankruptcy could mean, in its finality, only repudiation on the one hand or ruinous inflation on the other.

Mr. Chairman, I believe I know the farmers of my district well enough to say that they want to retain their old American way of life. They want to keep their liberty of action. They are willing to forego any false pleasure of suckling a governmental sugar teat in order to retain their liberties. Why, Mr. Chairman, what saccharin teat was ever devised in a nursery, to still the fretful cries of teething children, half so sweet as the liberties of the individual under the American way of life?

The Great Teacher of Galilee once asked:

What profiteth a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?

Mr. Chairman, what profiteth the people of the soil if they gain the whole favor of the New Deal administration and lose their independence?

The reverse side of every credit is debt. Why should it be that all of our efforts are being expended so as to afford the farmers an opportunity to get into debt while no effort at all is being expended to protect our markets and to enable the farmers to get out of debt?

I do not believe the answer lies in obscure and abstract theories applied by bureaucrats who are far from the farm and actual farming. If their contentions are correct that we are making tenants at the rate of 40,000 to 47,000 per year under New Deal farm policies, is it not time to change those policies? Will not the answer be found by a return to common sense thrift; to economy in Government, and the discarding of loose fiscal policies that have wrecked liberal governments so often in the recent past? Should we not save the millions of sound farmers still left on the farms, instead of wildly spending to impair the sound along with the unsound farmers?

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLEVENGER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Does not the gentleman suppose that the policy that has been followed in connection with the farmers of the country and the working people of the country is the New Deal's idea of the more abundant life, of which we have heard so much, and of which we have seen so little?

Mr. CLEVENGER. I am afraid that is so.

It is important to preserve at least a sound core in our agriculture and add to it by gradually improving the earning of millions more, rather than to stake the economic future of all agriculture in more of these New Deal schemes.

These schemes are mostly vote traps, anyway. In our own committee the fear has been expressed that better farm prices might cause an upturn in land values to a point where the farm-tenant plan could not be put over. Must a member from a farm district go along with these quack schemes in order to be rated a friend of the farmer? I do not think so.

Saving $16 to $17 per year to farm borrowers in interest will not save them when the State Department, through reciprocal treaties, is getting ready to open up the home market to cheap foreign products.

Our Secretary of State seems to be allergic to customs houses; he may be depended upon to press his free-trade ideas by the reciprocal-trade method. The time has come when the New Deal schemers must quit trying to figure out how to lend the farmers more and more money. Such a policy only gets the farmers more and more in debt.

Much has been said of parity for agriculture during these last few days.

Parity for agriculture, ladies and gentlemen, was lost one day in June 1912, in the city of Chicago at a time when the country was enjoying the prosperity and happiness that our Democrat friends now picture as the alpha and omega of agriculture and industrial bliss—days when the entire cost of all the Federal establishments was less than the amounts of appropriations contained in the agriculture bill—days when both farmers and workingmen had money to spend, when taxes were not a nightmare, when specters of regimentation, eviction, and bankruptcy did not haunt the American farmer, worker, and businessman as he sought his couch at night.

That day a convention met to nominate a candidate for the Presidency and split wide open. A minority President, if you please, elected by a quarter of a million less votes than William Jennings Bryan's smallest vote, came into power, and with him, control of the Congress. Out the window went the protective tariff that had made this country great, and had made the American farmer a sovereign instead of a peasant or a serf. From the peak of prosperity and busy workshops we sank into bread lines and despair. Through 1914, 1915, and 1916—until the war orders brought business of a grisly nature to our shores, idleness in our shops continued. In post-war days we know how the millions of returned service men and discharged munition and ship workers walked the streets in vain in their search for jobs. We remember when in 1920, the props were yanked from under the inflated farm prices by the action of the Wilson administration, and prices of agricultural products, geared up by Government stimulation to "feed the world" as the sloganeer then proclaimed, hit the toboggan, and the American farmer hit the skids.

A new Republican tariff helped him recover somewhat, but farmers' friends and tinkerers have again just about legislated him out of business. The Democrats have had control of Congress for 9 years, the Secretary of State has about traded the farmer out of his birthright. The rice farmer competes with the oriental in his rice paddy, too poor to eat any but the poorest of his own crop; the cotton farmer competes with the labor of India, Egypt, China, and Brazil; the sugar farmer with the island workers of the Tropics, and the dairy and wheat farmer with the peasant labor of the world.

I am unwilling to place my fellow Americans in competition with Koreans, Manchukuoans, or Chinese prodded to their tasks by Japanese bayonets jabbed in their briskets. Let us regain this American market to American farmers and American workingmen. Prices, like water, seek the lowest level. Compete with serfs and you live like serfs.

Now, after 7 years of wild-eyed spending, spending the patrimony of today's and tomorrow's children, we hear talk of rubber dollars and repudiation. Are the men on the other side of the aisle so devoid of every moral sense as to propose such a thing? As rubber stamps, they spend and spend and elect and elect. Now they want to print and print and inflate and inflate, and bust and bust,

As a boy following a team of long-legged mules after four sections of steel harrow up and down Iowa corn fields, I thrilled to the story of how that grand old "gray-maned lion" of New England turned in the Senate of the United States upon the financial jitter bugs of that day, who yapped like curs at the heels of a great Democratic President and castigated them for the demagogues they were, and wound up by saying: "This country climbed out of the slough of despond on Grover Cleveland's backbone."

Oh, for a backbone like that now. Oh, for strength, instead of native stubbornness mistaken for strength.

No, my friends on the right side of the aisle you need not go back to the far days when you deserted the concepts of Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson. You have deserted the teachings of Grover Cleveland, the greatest and strongest Democrat of them all. You New Dealers, elected upon the promise to cut the cost of Government 25 percent, have mortgaged the lives of tomorrow's children and now talk of welshing on the Nation's debt.

Can political immorality find a lower level? Have you none of Grover Cleveland's integrity and fortitude? If you think debasing the dollar can cool the fever of inflation, you are like a man who thinks he can cure a bodily fever by changing the degrees upon a clinical thermometer.

Have the courage to cut before it is too late. Must America go bankrupt before strong hands can seize the wheel of the ship of state? Are there not even two score of you who will back up the gallant Virginian? [Applause.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation bill before us provides about $850,000,000 for the War Department. This is not quite what the Budget recommended, but it undoubtedly was considered adequate for our national defense by the subcommittee drafting the bill. I notice that the hearings of more than 900 printed pages are filled with expert testimony for the committee's guidance. May I, in addition to the expert testimony of our military authorities, record here a statement of what I have received from thoughtful citizens of my State with regard to the country's needs on the southern border? I have recently received many communications from patriotic bodies and civic organizations advising of the need along our international border between this country and Mexico. Only a few days ago I called attention to the need of strengthening our border patrol and our immigration service at this backdoor of the Nation, and I am highly pleased that, even in an effort of economy, the House last week saw fit to retain the border patrol and that the committee reporting the appropriation for the Labor Department even restored a proposed reduction by the Budget Department when the bill was drafted. That is money well spent, for it is across that international line that many undesirable aliens enter, or attempt to enter, unlawfully, not only from Mexico but through Mexico from Asia and Europe also.

We need to guard our country against invasion, whether it be a peaceful invasion of undesirable individuals which may be checked by an adequate immigration staff or a military invasion which must be protected against by adequate military facilities.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman is making a fine statement, but does the gentleman know that in the same Budget the number of immigration inspectors was reduced by 39 or more, at a time when we most need them to clear up illegal entries and the cases of persons who are to be deported? By reducing the appropriation one-hundred-and-eighty-thousand-odd dollars in the name of economy, have they not broken the strength of this arm, and is not this a wrong economy?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I am aware of that, and I agree with the gentleman that it is a wrong economy. I regret that part of the reduction, although I approve the action of the House in that bill in regard to the border patrol.

Fort Huachuca is the only military post along this extensive stretch of international border from El Paso to the Pacific Ocean. Regardless of how friendly or how unfriendly the Republic of Mexico is, or might be, a powerful foe attacking us would undoubtedly attempt to do so through Mexico. Not only do we have great industrial plants, such as smelters and the like, right near the border, but we have great public works, such as the Boulder Dam, within easy striking distance from the international line between the State of Arizona and the State of Sonora, Mexico. The same thing is true between the State of California and the State of Baja California in Mexico. I have long felt that adequate military protection along that border requires a proper military highway, paralleling the border and fairly close to it, also flying fields at suitable places, such as Douglas, Fort Huachuca, and Yuma, as well as suitable points in New Mexico and California, and also a military aviation center at Fort Huachuca.

While much has been done recently for the rehabilitation of Fort Huachuca, much should yet be done. Its location, its strategic importance, its value in our scheme of national defense, together with its actual needs, justify a five-point program in the treatment of this post: First, more barracks—a beginning has been made for providing new barracks last year and more are contemplated. But even when the full program is carried out there will still be a lack for the present regiment stationed there. Let it be remembered that some of the barracks now in use were built of adobe in 1881, but these are said to be better than some built in 1916. Second, a new hospital has been authorized, but no appropriations yet available, unless covered in this bill's blanket provisions. The present hospital building is more than 50 years old, and large sums are being spent on upkeep without satisfactory results. Third, the post is in need of the installation of natural gas for cooking and heating purposes. There is a supply of gas not far from the post, and there is no supply of wood or coal, such as is now being used, very near this post. Fourth, for many years there has been an inadequate water supply at Fort Huachuca, which has been remedied in part by a 14-inch well. As a guaranty against accident, an additional 14-inch well is needed, not to increase the present adequate water supply but to guarantee it. Fifth, a post exchange, gymnasium, and service club is vitally needed and will contribute to the well-being and comfort of the personnel.

The climate at this point is so healthful and inviting that many officers seek location at this place. The forbidding quarters and facilities heretofore have been less inviting, and yet some of the greatest names of our military history have been connected with Fort Huachuca. Some time ago I talked with the Chief of Staff, Gen. Malin Craig, who had some pleasant recollections of Fort Huachuca. He had been stationed there many years ago, and I believe had had a child born at Fort Huachuca.

These needs and possibilities I have seen with my own eyes are matters of personal knowledge and are impressed upon me by patriotic groups and thoughtful citizens whose patriotism is beyond question and whose judgment I highly respect. [Applause.]

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JENNINGS].

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, that the bandit acts of Germany, Russia, and Japan have alienated the sympathies of our people, that there is a strong pro-Ally sentiment in this country, makes the danger of this world conflict all the more a threat to this Nation. We are on the road to war. We are traveling that road more rapidly than we did in 1917. Fighting words lead to blows; such words have not only been used by some of our public servants high in authority, but we have walked dangerously near the scene of conflict in more ways than one.

The propaganda mills have begun to grind in favor of this Nation's participation in the present World War. History repeats. They ground in 1917 and in the preceding years. The grist was a debt of more than $20,000,000,000 and other billions loaned to European powers. These loans are lost forever; they have disappeared into the limbo of things forgotten and gone. They will never be repaid.

The American people listened to and believed the siren slogan "He kept us out of war"; and then, within 30 days after President Wilson's second inauguration, we were in the war. In to the extent of 4,791,172 armed men; in to the number of 2,059,629 overseas; in to the extent of 130,103 total deaths; 39,347 were killed, 13,999 died of wounds—53,346 were combat deaths; 75,460 died of diseases; 1,297 died of other causes; and 201,325 were wounded. Thus, in camp, in the trenches, in the muck and mire of European battlefields the flower of American manhood perished.

I never go into any county of my district that I do not grasp the hands of World War veterans broken in body and health by their experience over there. And again and again I look into the faces of Gold Star Mothers who laid their sons as living sacrifices in the hands of the Moloch of War. A war, they said, "to make the world safe for democracy—to end all wars."

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. Does the gentleman set forth in his remarks the number of boys who have gone insane as a result of the war?

Mr. JENNINGS. I have not that information here, but I know that that has happened in thousands of cases.

Mr. REED of New York. I think the figures show a jump from something like 28,000 to 60,000.

Mr. JENNINGS. No sooner was it ended than the ground was made fallow and the seeds of this war were sown by England and France in the Treaty of Versailles. Lost provinces and colonial empires fell into the laps of England and France. This Nation's toll was the flu, a German police dog, billions of debts, the enmity of our former Allies, and the ghastly losses of young lives needlessly sacrificed.

From now on we shall hear more and more that this is our war, that it is being fought for the preservation of human freedom, that an allied victory means our security, an allied defeat means the overthrow of our civilization and the destruction of our liberty, that this war is a repetition of the struggles recounted by Creasy in his Fifteen Decisive Battles.

The allies, we are told, "stand at Armageddon and battle for the Lord." We must go in. We must be ready to give Europe another transfusion of blood from the veins of American boys.

We have heard it said that "America's frontier is on the Rhine"; that sanctions must be employed "short of war."

True, there has been a variation in the pronouncements of those high in authority. But the fact remains that in an address at Chicago, Ill., on October 5, 1937, the President said:

> When an epidemic of physical disease starts to spread, the community approves and joins in a quarantine of the patients in order to protect the health of the community against the spread of the disease.

And again at Chautauqua, N. Y., on August 14, 1936, he said:

> We are not isolationists except insofar as we seek to isolate ourselves completely from war. Yet we must remember that so long as war exists on earth there will be some danger that even the nation which most ardently desires peace may be drawn into war. * * *
> I wish I could keep war from all nations; but that is beyond my power. I can at least make certain that no act of the United States helps to produce or to promote war. I can at least make clear that the conscience of America revolts against war and that any nation which provokes war forfeits the sympathy of the people of the United States.

In this connection it may well be suggested that the American people, while they naturally sympathize with the nation or the people they deem unjustly to have been attacked, have no desire to have Uncle Sam play the role of a world judge or a world policeman to adjudicate and settle the endless brawls and wars of Europe.

Again in a fireside chat on October 12, 1937, there came to us the words:

> I want our great democracy to be wise enough to realize the aloofness from war is not promoted by unawareness of war. In a world of mutual selfishness, peace must be affirmatively reached for. It cannot just be wished for. It cannot just be waited for.

In a letter to the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Speaker BANKHEAD, on the Ludlow war bill, the President stated:

> Such an amendment to the Constitution as that proposed would cripple any President in his conduct of our foreign relations, and it would encourage other nations to believe that they could violate American rights with impunity.
> I fully realize that the sponsors of this proposal sincerely believe that it would be helpful in keeping the United States out of war. I am convinced it would have the opposite effect.

And the language of the President's telegram to Hitler, asking him to continue negotiations, September 27, 1938, should, of a truth, bespeak the attitude of this country with respect to European wars:

> The Government of the United States has no political involvements in Europe.

And in the President's address at Kingston, Ontario, on August 18, 1938, we hear these words:

> The Dominion of Canada is part of the sisterhood of the British Empire. I give to you assurance that the people of the United States will not stand idly by if domination of Canadian soil is threatened by any other empire.

And again on October 26, 1938, we hear this:

> It is becoming increasingly clear that peace by fear has no higher or more enduring quality than peace by the sword.
> There can be no peace if national policy adopts as a deliberate instrument the threat of war.

Again, in a radio address on November 4, 1938, this was said:

> We need in public office, above all things, men wise enough to avoid passing incidents where passion and force try to substitute themselves for judgment and negotiations.

In the annual message to Congress on the state of the Nation, January 4, 1939, is this declaration:

> There comes a time in the affairs of men when they must prepare to defend not their homes alone but the tenets of faith and humanity on which their churches, their governments, and their very civilization are founded. The defense of religion, of democracy, and of good faith among nations is all the same fight. To save one we must now make up our minds to save all.
> In our foreign relations we have learned from the past what not to do; from new wars we have learned what we must do.
> We have learned that God-fearing democracies of the world which observe the sanctity of treaties and good faith in their dealings with other nations cannot safely be indifferent to international lawlessness anywhere. They cannot forever let pass, without effective protest, acts of aggression against sister nations, acts which automatically undermine all of us.
> Obviously they must proceed along practical, peaceful lines. But the mere fact that we rightly decline to intervene with arms to prevent acts of aggression does not mean that we must act as if there were no aggression at all. Words may be futile, but war is not the only means of commanding a decent respect for the opinions of mankind. There are many methods short of war, but stronger and more effective than mere words, of bringing home to aggressor governments the aggregate sentiments of our own people.
> At the very least we can and should avoid any action or any lack of action which will encourage, assist, or build up an aggressor. We have learned that when we deliberately try to legislate neutrality our neutrality laws may operate unevenly and unfairly, may actually give aid to an aggressor and deny it to the victim. The instinct of self-preservation should warn us that we ought not to let that happen any more.

Is it possible that England and France were led to believe that if they engaged in a war for world empire and for the settlement of feuds and racial hatreds ages old that this country would come to their aid; that we would "not stand idly by" if their soil was threatened by a nation deemed by them or by us an "aggressor" power; that there are or would be in power in this Nation "men wise enough to avoid passing incidents where passion and force try to substitute themselves for judgment and negotiations?"

Did England and France enter this war in the belief that this country would use "methods short of war, but stronger and more effective than mere words, of bringing home to aggressor governments the aggregate sentiments of our own people?"

Did Poland become a vicarious sacrifice, impelled to fight both Germany and Russia under the urge of the declaration that "the instinct of self-preservation should warn us that we ought not to let that happen any more?" If so, more is the pity.

The occasion for the latest beating of war drums and sounding of propaganda bugles in this country is the German charge that our Ambassador to the Court of St. James, Mr. Joseph P. Kennedy, and our peripatetic and ever-vocal Ambassador to France, Mr. William C. Bullitt, have meddled in the pre-war negotiations between England, France, and Poland, on the one hand, and Germany, and Russia, on the other. Whether this charge, clumsy though it be, is but another example of Nazi mendacity or bungling intermeddling on the part of our Ambassadors matters little. The charge has been met with denial and recrimination. Let it be assumed that it is out of the whole cloth. It raises an issue of far-reaching significance and profound concern to the thoughtful people of this country. It is just possible, if these gentlemen have played with international pitch and meddled in the pre-war developments leading up to the present World War, the destruction of Poland, the invasion and partition of Finland, their words are but a lunar reflection of what has been heretofore quoted. In view of Mr. Kennedy's eminent career and sound common sense, few will believe that he has been guilty of the conduct imputed to him. Whether Mr. Bullitt has been sucking eggs and failed to successfully hide the shells, is another question. This we do know: Our playboy Minister to Canada, Mr. Duke Cromwell, after wending his way through the highballs, was caught among the sheep with wool in his teeth. On this one subject I am satisfied the minds of the American people are made up. They are determined that the effect of scotch and soda on the befuddled brain of a playboy shall not send American boys to European battlefields. The fathers and mothers of this country are opposed to his kind of a "bull in a china shop"—they do not care how many fortunes he marries and dissipates, just so he does not set the house of our existence on fire.

What concerns the American people is this: Are these words and these activities all leading up to an international emergency? The evils which have trailed the blunders that have been inflicted on this country have been perpetrated in the name of and under the pretense of an oft-proclaimed emergency. It was Madam Roland who, in the shadow of her impending doom, exclaimed: "O Liberty! How many crimes are committed in thy name!"

It is for this Congress to determine that the crime of participating in this cockeyed war shall not be perpetrated against the American people in the name of an emergency. It is not our war. We did not make it. We have no stake in it. The safety of this country must not be made to depend on what happens in Europe.

If Japan stands astride the prostrate form of China, it was England and English statesmen who declined to cooperate with this Nation when Japan first drew her sword and unleashed her war machine in Manchuria. If England had then stood with this Nation under the leadership of former Secretary of State Stimson, Japan could have been stopped. England turned on the red light for us and gave Japan the green light.

The Siegfried line is on the Rhine, and Hitler's millions are poised for an invasion of the French, Swiss, Holland, and Belgium borders, not to mention the Balkans, because England stayed the hand of France when Hitler, in violation of the Versailles Treaty, sent his armies to the borders of France. England looked with complacency on the German conquest of Austria. Both England and France acquiesced in Italy's rape of Ethiopia and Albania. Czechoslovakia, with one of the finest armies in Europe, stood on the Carpathian Mountains, a natural line of defense, backed by the world's second best munitions plant, the Skoda Works. She sent out a Macedonian call to England and France to fulfill their treaty obligations to her. And Mr. Chamberlain, umbrella in hand, said: "Czechoslovakia is a small country, far away, about which we know but little," and this heroic republic was sold down the river into Nazi bondage.

The next victim in England and France's game of power politics was Poland. They said to her, when by concession she might have remained free from invasion and destruction, "Stand pat; fight; we will stand back of you." They kept that promise; they stood back of Poland—far back—and the land of Kosciusko, with its galaxy of Polish heroes, is no more.

Today the great heart of America and her pocketbook are open to heroic Finland, one of the little friends of England and France, whose wounds, "poor dumb mouths," testify to the fidelity of English and French friendship; and the words of David Lloyd George, England's war Premier, yet ring in our ears:

> It is the old trouble—too late. Too late with Czechoslovakia; too late with Poland; certainly too late with Finland. It is always too late or too little, or both, and that is the road to disaster.

This is the record. And on this record one fact must ever be borne in mind—the men who make wars do not fight them.

Another war for this country to pull European chestnuts out of the fire will ruin this Nation, will ruin America, God's last hope for the world.

Has it come to this, that to create a situation in the name of which a handful of appointive officers, what Mr. CARTER GLASS calls Janizaries, may extend their lease on power, a European war emergency is to be manufactured as an excuse for a third term? Are we to scrap America under the guise of saving Europe? Are we to overthrow the two-term precedence set by Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, and all their successors? And if so, why not a fourth, why not a succession; why not a dynasty?

One war at a time is enough. For 7 years the New Deal has waged war on the depression. Ten million unemployed are on our soil. This army is yet to be disbanded. For us its continuance and maintenance is more ominous than "an army with banners." There is before us a mountain of debt, more than forty-five billions high. Do not pile another of like size on it.

The world is on fire. We played the fool in 1917. Even a burnt child dreads the fire. Let us attend to our own business and let other people's business alone. Let us set our house in order. We have tried to drink ourselves sober; to spend ourselves prosperous on borrowed money; to get rich by going in debt; to get out of the hole by digging it deeper; to lift a nation by its bootstraps.

What would war mean for America? What sane man is there who does not shudder at its ghastly terrors—its devastating effect on our civilization, on our economic system, on our credit already bent to the breaking point, on our industry struggling to keep on its feet and to go forward under its own power, on our liberty, on the lives and happiness of our people?

> 'Tis liberty alone that gives the flower of life its fragrance and perfume, and we are weeds without it.

From the mouth of the Secretary of the Navy, Charles A. Edison, in January of this year, we have a forerunner of the bureaucracy and the dictatorial powers that would be riveted upon the necks of the American people if we get into this war. He astounded the Nation by requesting that the President be invested in time of peace with the broad powers to commandeer ships, factories, and war materials. He sent this proposition to the Congress at the opening of this session. A storm of protest arose. The concensus of the opinion of the country was thus expressed by the Kansas City Star:

> Those, of course, are the powers of a dictator. They are utterly repugnant to democratic principles in time of peace. Why are they being asked? * * * In short, is there any national emergency that could possibly justify the grant of such sweeping authority to the President? * * * No wonder Senator Borah calls the proposal "startling." No wonder so stanch an administration man as Senator MINTON declares that it "violates the spirit of a democratic country."

War would mean that this Nation would no longer be physically, mentally, morally, or spiritually free. Our manpower, our wealth, our factories, our farms would be drafted, and the people of this country would be under the rule of a dictatorship. The American people, their knees in suppliance bent, would tremble at the power of their new master. The businessman, big and little, the farmer, and all he possesses, would be in a governmental strait jacket. Peacetime America would be transformed into an armed camp. Our whole industrial and agricultural system—our entire economic set-up—would be made over into a gigantic war machine for the raising, through the draft, of the Army, and the feeding, the clothing, the training of our youth. Think of it!

American boys taken from their homes, from school, from the field, from the factory, from the mine, and builded into a living wall of flesh and blood—to fight, to suffer, to die in trenches and on fields beyond the seas. Do you think for one minute that America, as we have known it, as we hope she may continue, would ever again be the heritage to our children that it has been to us?

These are the things we are asked to give up to make the world safe for European empires. Is our security dependent on Britain's rule of India, Africa, the islands of the sea? Is our destiny challenged when the far-flung colonial empire of France is menaced? Are we to sneeze every time Europe takes snuff, and to get out our guns every time their perpetual wars break out? No; a thousand times no! We have no right to make of this Nation a pawn in the game of the Old World's high-powered politics. We have no right to shed the blood of our young men like water and to pour out the treasure of this people like sand in the age-old hates, grasping ambitions, intrigues, jealousies, and endless brawls and war of Europe. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, sometimes I think it is profitable for us to turn back the pages of history and look at the record as it may relate to some of the things that we are attempting to do at the present time.

Many years ago there was a very bright young man who had many novel ideas in regard to high finance. He was born in Edinburgh, Scotland. He was the son of a goldsmith, known in those days as a banker. It is reported that he came over to this country in colonial days, where he saw some of our banks of issue of paper money in operation, money issued against land. In those days we tried many experiments in money. Some bank notes were issued against rice and some against tobacco. This young man, whose name was John Law, went back to Europe before he had seen the ultimate disastrous results of the bank issues of paper money. He was finally driven out of England, or forced to leave England, charged with committing a murder in a love affair. He went over to Amsterdam and tried to interest Dutch bankers in his new scheme of paper money. He was unable to interest these men of sound money views in his fantastic scheme. He finally wrote a book which attracted very little attention, relating to trade and industry. Then he journeyed over to Paris, where he tried to interest Louis XIV in his plan of issuing paper money secured by land and the public credit.

France was in a woefully bad financial condition at the time, but Louis XIV was prejudiced against the Huguenots and would not listen to the proposals of this young man, John Law, who then entered into various gambling activities and became quite dissolute. Finally he left Paris—in fact, was escorted out of Paris by the chief of police as an undesirable character. He went to Genoa and stayed around there for a while as a gambler. When the Regent Orleans came into power France was practically bankrupt. They were discussing the question of how they could run the country through the wringer of bankruptcy. John Law, the advocate of paper money and inflation, was able to get a hearing with the Regent Orleans. He pointed out how it would be possible to issue paper money, secured by land and the public credit, and thus relieve France of the burden of debt. The Regent Orleans listened with great sympathy and finally authorized him to create a private bank to put his paper-money plan in operation. He issued paper money and it met with great success for a brief time, the whole of France rejoicing at the return of what appeared to be national prosperity. Industry sprang up in the provinces and the people felt that they had found the answer to the problems of threatened insolvency. But they soon found it necessary to issue more paper money, and as a result they established a national bank in place of the private bank of issue, and this young man, John Law, was made director of it. The bank issued more and more of the paper money. The life of the bank was rather short and finally the whole thing burst in what was known as the Mississippi scheme. They had given Law authority to operate a scheme in the Province of Louisiana. It was pictured to the investors of that day that the Province of Louisiana was a land of gold and silver, and the plan of the promoters was to use slave labor by capturing the Indians and forcing them to work, but there was no gold or silver there and finally the whole venture collapsed. France was left in poverty. They struggled along for years to overcome the situation which had been created by this wild experiment in the unlimited issue of paper money.

You would have thought that the French people would have learned their lesson, but, 70 years later, they found themselves again deeply in debt, and so they started another paper-money program. They figured if they could confiscate all of the church property and make this land, which constituted about one-fifth of the most valuable part of France, the backing for paper money, known as assignats, they would have the best security in the world for paper money.

This was discussed for a time in convention. The scheme was resisted by the sound financiers at the time, who pointed out the disaster that the Law experiment brought about; but it was claimed by the advocates of paper money that the reason John Law's scheme did not work was that too much paper money had been issued. Finally, Mirabeau, the great orator of France, made his appeal for the new system, and it was adopted. The church lands were confiscated, and money was issued against the land. The whole of France rejoiced again as the issue of paper money brought back what seemed like prosperity. People speculated, and they firmly believed that they had found a new way of living without working, without producing. But their periods of joy were rather short, because they found it necessary to issue more of the assignats and to increase the amount of the issues by millions and millions. As they issued more and more, the prices of everything went up, until finally flour cost practically $45 a bushel in our money, and everything else rose proportionately in price. Then they cried for the issue of still more assignats, and, although the bank issued them, yet the periods of prosperity became shorter and shorter, and each depression brought greater poverty and suffering to the people. Finally the people were brought to their knees. It required over 100 years following this paper-money debauch to reestablish their industrial institutions. Everything practically worth while was destroyed as a result of these experiments.

A distinguished statesman and scholar, describing this inflationary period, said:

> Inflation ended in the complete financial, moral, and political prostration of France. All this was caused because thoughtful people yielded to the promises and blandishments of dreamers, theorists, phrasemongers, declaimers, schemers, speculators, or to that sort of reform which is "the last refuge of a scoundrel."

If I had the time, I would go into the details at considerable length in regard to the arguments pro and con, one side presenting the arguments which we hear on this floor in favor of inflation. We hear them year in and year out urging the one great remedy. That remedy, so they claim, is to issue more currency, regardless of its metallic backing. On the other side, the sound financiers of France gave their arguments, and they were the same arguments that you hear today in favor of sound money. It would seem that after those experiments of long ago and the more recent experience of Germany, Russia, Italy, France, and Austria that Members of Congress would hesitate to advocate any program which had driven other nations to ruin and despair. We know what happened in Germany. We know to a certain extent what is happening right in this country. Germany had a sound banking system. She had a sound insurance system. She had great endowed institutions. What happened? Heavily in debt, they thought they could start the printing presses, and they did start them, and for a time it seemed to work; but without going into detail, the ultimate result was that the insurance policies of that great nation turned to ashes in the hands of the people, and large bequests were not worth the postage that was used to mail the check to the beneficiary.

The finest line of endowed educational institutions in Europe found their endowments disappearing until they were only able to recover in some instances a very small percent, and some none at all of their endowments. The University of Frankfort's endowments were practically destroyed. Germany had a system where old people, by paying a certain amount of money, could establish themselves in their old age in a fine apartment, where they could live well, where they could have good food and the comforts of life. Those endowments were destroyed to the point where there was not enough left to enable the old people, who had paid for security in their old age, to buy even black bread and coffee. Banks were destroyed. All bank deposits disappeared. Now, that ought to be a warning to this country that we can go just about so far in piling up a national debt and no further with any degree of safety to our institutions. In 8 years sixty-six billions have been spent by the New Deal and our national debt is right up to the ceiling as authorized by law. If we take into consideration the contingent liabilities, then we have already reached the limit. As I recall it, the Secretary of the Treasury testified that we might possibly stand a debt of $50,000,000,000, but that he would not be responsible for the consequences if we went beyond that point. That is getting very close to the danger point.

Now, we have the recent experience of Germany, Russia, Austria, and even France which narrowly escaped extreme inflation. I believe that the French people are more terrified over the possibility of inflation than they are over the threatened invasion by the enemy armies. So I say the time has come in the United States to stop and think with regard to all of the collosal New Deal expenditures. There are hundreds of proposals here to spend money which may be beneficial, but when I realize that inflation is the most dangerous instrumentality that has ever been devised by the wit of man to destroy free government, I am saying to you that I believe my people can afford to wait before financing even many desirable and worthy activities.

May I say that already in this country of over 600 endowed educational institutions the aggregate income from their endowments has shrunk 50 percent. That is true of our eleemosynary and charitable institutions. Are we going to take the next step? I am not speaking to you politically. I am trying to provoke thought, to make my colleagues conscious of their responsibility. I would like to have the country feel its responsibility.

I believe that the intelligent forces of this country, in the light of history, must stop, look, and listen, and be content with smaller appropriations for many worthy projects until such time as we can balance our Federal Budget and thus assure our institutions and our people of their future security and safety. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, the military subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee has brought out a bill which is a credit to their hard work and good judgment in an extremely difficult situation. There are some aspects which call for further study and discussion, but I must say that they have been faced with one of the most difficult tasks because of the financial situation and because of the fact that we have for practically 20 years allowed deficiencies to grow up in the equipment for our defense. The bill takes a long step toward remedying these deficiencies but I think in some respects it might well go somewhat further.

The only safe solution of our problems from a military standpoint is the immediate provision of full equipment for the small defensive army now known to us as the initial protective force, consisting of our existing forces exclusive of overseas garrisons in our possessions. This would be increased to a subsequent continental army composed of the existing units of the Regular Army and National Guard expanded to a strength of some 750,000 troops in units, plus 250,000 in reserve. Under what is known as the protective mobilization plan we should have equipment and ammunition on hand for that force for any mission needed for the defense of this hemisphere, certainly, for the defense of this continent. Lacking large reserves of ammunition and supplies, we should have enough in reserve for a few months with provision for industrial production of sufficient magnitude to supply the war needs of that force, delivery in quantity to begin by the time the reserves are exhausted. We do not have that provision today but we have made a start on the equipment of the initial protective force. This bill continues the acquisition of that equipment. It should complete it.

I am not going to take a great deal of time but I really would like to quote from some of the experiences we had in the last war. There is unfortunately an idea in the country that large purchases by the Allies in this war will make up for a lack of existing manufacturing capacity on our part. I would like to call the attention of the committee to the fact that during the World War although there were 3 years in which we were not in that war and that before we got in it the Allies had almost unlimited funds consisting not only of their own resources but what they were able to borrow here, we were very short of manufacturing capacity for the sort of things we needed when we got into it. I hope we will never get into another, but we should not depend on something which we know did not supply us with capacity at another time to supply ourselves for our own defense. For instance, let us take the matter of machine guns and 75-millimeter guns and ammunition:

Machine guns: Of orders for 4,000 heavy Vickers machine guns placed in December 1916, 2,000 were produced by the end of 1917. In 1918, 10,000 of these weapons were produced. Greater quantity production was impossible because of technical difficulties in manufacture. Production of the Browning automatic rifle and Browning machine gun began in quantity by the middle of 1918, some 13 months after the decision to manufacture them. It was a question of securing and setting up the necessary manufacturing equipment and learning how to produce these new arms. Two hundred and nineteen thousand machine guns and automatic rifles of all types were produced in 1918 compared to 8,000 in 1917, and of these 219,000, 160,000 were produced in the last half of 1918.

Seventy-five-millimeter guns: Initial plans in 1917 called for 3,200 (2,100 at once, and 1,100 a few months later for reserve and replacement). Those plans were increased in 1918 to require some 8,000 pieces for 1919. An early production of 300 to 400 per month was required if the supply was to be met within a reasonable time. Actually no production was reached in 1917, and only 100 per month of all calibers of artillery by July 1918, and 400 per month of all calibers by October 1918, 19 months after war was declared.

Seventy-five-millimeter ammunition: Production in small quantity began in January 1918 but it was not until October 1918 that production neared 3,000,000 per month, approximately three-fourths of the monthly requirement. After orders were placed the average time to produce finished shells and deliver to shipside was 366 days. The machining of the shell body was in itself a huge task requiring great industrial genius for its solution. To machine 1,000 shells in 8 hours, 78 machines, some of special design, were required. Twenty-four operations were required on each shell body requiring 30 minutes if no delay occurred in the factory.

As to 155 gun-recoil mechanism which was new to American manufacturers:

On an order placed November 1, 1917, production began in January 1919, 14 months later, and production of 45 per month was reached in July 1919, 20 months later. It was necessary to design 22 machines for this order, in addition to other manufacturing aids, and learn how to apply them to this mechanism.

The same situation prevailed in regard to many other items which we needed, in spite of the billions which were spent in those days by the allied purchasing agents in this country.

Ninety-six percent of the money spent by the Allies today in their purchases in this country goes for aircraft, which, of course, are not included in the educational-order program, because in the aircraft program the additional manufacturing capacity is being provided by foreign orders and by the orders of our own armed forces, so there is no need in that item for educational orders or production planning for further expansion.

Of the 4 percent of foreign orders now placed in this country for other than aircraft material, not more than 9 orders have been placed for items substantially the same as those included in the War Department program of educational orders, and there are approximately 575 problem items on the list of the Ordnance Department alone. Furthermore, this 4 percent of foreign orders already placed will serve the purpose of education only in about 12 of the approximately 1,200 plants now scheduled by the War Department for inclusion in its educational-orders program.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. I yield.

Mr. POWERS. Does the gentleman know how much in dollars the 4 percent he speaks of amounts to?

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. I do not have the figure here. I have the items. There are not more than 9 items out of 575 critical items which the War Department would like to place educational orders on. Those plants will not be reached by the items contained in the foreign orders.

Foreign orders may increase the production capacity for individual items, but what I want to bring to the attention of the Committee is that I believe that further attention should be paid the study of these items in order that we may insure ourselves of the capacity for the things we need, that we may find out what items we will not need to spend money on for educational orders, and that we may find out on what items production orders should be used in order to provide education. I believe the study will show, as it does in these foreign orders, that in most items we still need to increase manufacturing capacity, tools, and training of manufacturing plants so that we may be assured of production for our own defense.

The popular overestimation of the effect of the foreign orders on our production capacity today is brought out by the following facts furnished me by the planning branch:

(1) In accordance with your verbal request, I am submitting the following information with respect to the effect of foreign orders on the War Department's educational-orders program.

(2) The question has been asked whether current orders for munitions are not in fact securing for industry the training visualized under the educational-orders program. The answer is, "No." Of the munitions orders placed in this country from abroad, 96 percent in money value is for aircraft material. Recognizing the expansion that is occurring in the aircraft industry by reason of current orders, the War Department program for educational orders has excluded this industry from participation in the contracts awarded.

(3) Of the 4 percent of foreign orders now placed in this country for other than aircraft material, not more than 9 orders have been placed for items substantially the same as those included in the War Department's program of educational orders. This compares with a total of approximately 575 problem items on the shopping list of the Ordnance Department alone. Furthermore, this 4 percent of foreign orders already placed will serve the purpose of educational orders only in about 12 of the approximately 1,200 plants now scheduled by the War Department for inclusion in its educational-orders program. This program makes full allowance for such foreign orders as well as current-production orders placed by the War Department under the rearmament program and avoids duplication of the training obtained by such orders.

(4) The War Department has estimated that $16,250,000 will be necessary for carrying on the educational-orders program in the coming year. Of this total, the proposed program contemplates that $14,250,000 will be spent in preparation for the production of ordnance matériel and the remainder for similar preparations with respect to communication equipment for the Signal Corps, and defensive equipment for the Chemical Warfare Service. The program, as previously stated, makes no provision for educational orders for the aeronautical industry. Funds so far made available for educational orders will complete approximately one-fourth of the Ordnance Department's educational program. If no additional educational funds are made available the loss will therefore fall almost completely upon the Ordnance Department which, as indicated, has by far the most difficult problem in preparing industry for a possible war load.

(5) In brief, the curtailment of funds for educational orders will have a most serious effect on the ordnance program of industrial preparedness—a program which is being aided only slightly by current orders and which is the real limiting factor in mobilizing under the War Department's plans for defense.

H. K. RUTHERFORD,
Colonel, Ordnance Department, Director, Planning Branch.

This bill makes progress in overcoming our deficiencies. In view of the situation abroad, should we not now complete the job? Only then will we be free to follow the course best suited to the needs of our own people, with dependence on, and indebtedness to, no other nations for our defense.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF].

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, despite the efforts of the White House and the Department of State to dismiss the tour of Europe just completed by Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles as a mere incident, productive of no consequences, the American people still are gravely disquieted.

There seems to be a widespread feeling that the misrepresentations, more politely referred to in diplomatic circles as "diplomatic evasions," shrouded in mysterious meddlings in the affairs of Europe by a personal emissary of President Roosevelt, might, in some way, entangle us in Europe's quarrels. The citizens were not reassured by the secrecy surrounding Mr. Welles' visit to the White House with Secretary of State Cordell Hull, after Mr. Roosevelt's "Colonel House" had arrived in Washington from his European trip. As I recently stated, the people do not see how the information accumulated by Under Secretary of State Welles can be of great value to either the Nation, or to President Roosevelt, unless the President is contemplating at sometime or another in the future attempting to mess into peace efforts between the belligerents.

Mr. Roosevelt's apparently uninvited efforts toward what he characterized as peace, in his messages to Mussolini, Hitler, Chamberlain, and the Pope in the past, do not indicate any lack of intent on his part to thrust himself into peace negotiations at the first opportune moment. Unless he intends to do this it is, of course, impossible to see any reason for his having sent Mr. Welles abroad at all. Certainly our diplomatic representatives already stationed abroad must have been capable of keeping the President advised as to current events across the sea.

In spite of the vehement denial from the White House, and other sources, of the charges in the German White Book of unwise, and unauthorized activities or statements, on the part of Ambassador Bullitt and Ambassador Kennedy, the people saw—as they had a right to see—another phase of the New Deal administration's apparent determination to mix up in quarrels between nations in Europe and in the Orient. The President may feel that three grains of salt would reduce some of the "freshness" of our diplomats in mixing into foreign affairs, but not even the President himself would suggest that three barrels of salt would change the aspects of the now famous speech of our effervescent Minister to Canada, James H. R. Cromwell.

There are some old adages which have a peculiarly fitting application to this situation as the people appear, from their letters, and other expressions, to view it.

Where there is so much smoke there must be some fire.
When the clouds are black, and the winds howl, a storm impends.

The fact that on April 2 at Toronto the redoubtable Jimmy Cromwell burst forth again indicates that he, at least, believes the administration wants to mix into foreign quarrels, wants to take sides, and means to go the point of action far beyond mere words—and maybe not "short of war."

It is significant, of course, that Mr. Cromwell still holds his diplomatic job. It is significant that, in spite of the rebuke to him by the Secretary of State, he forthwith launches another offense—not to say offensive—against foreign nations. All these things add up to something, certainly, and that something cannot, by any stretch of imagination, be viewed as a deep yearning on the part of the administration to preserve genuine neutrality and peace.

Times, conditions, and circumstances being what they are, the American people will do well to keep their eyes and ears open and be ready to signify in no uncertain terms to the administration their disapproval of any attempt to involve this Nation in any foreign entanglements. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and Mr. RAYBURN, having taken the Chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 9209, making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SNYDER. I suggest that we meet at 11 o'clock and, if possible, start general debate as early as possible, and complete the bill, if possible, tomorrow evening.

Mr. POWERS. There are too many "if possibles" in there. Does the gentleman intend to complete the consideration of the bill tomorrow night and then is it his intention that the House adjourn until Monday next?

APPROPRIATIONS FOR NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD AND WAGE AND HOUR ADMINISTRATION

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a telegram received by me from Henry Allai, president, District 14, United Mine Workers of America, Pittsburg, Kans. Mr. Allai is well known to me. He is a high-class citizen, who devotes 100 percent of his time and energy to serving his people. I ask the Senate to give full and careful consideration to his request that adequate funds be appropriated for the National Labor Relations Board and for the Wage and Hour Administration. I send the telegram to the desk for appropriate reference.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PITTSBURG, KANS., March 27, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

We are asking you to help restore full appropriations in behalf of the National Labor Relations Board and also for the Wage and Hour Administration, not as reported by the House Appropriations Committee. As the enemies of labor cannot successfully destroy these laws which are beneficial to organized labor, they are trying to destroy them to the extent that they will not function properly if the recommendation made by the House Appropriations Committee is enacted. We are asking you to do this in behalf of the wage earners of the State of Kansas, so that we also may be properly protected under the Federal laws of our country.

HENRY ALLAI,
President, District 14, United Mine Workers of America.

PROGRAM OF MINNEAPOLIS BUILDING TRADES COUNCIL

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I have here a statement in the nature of a petition from the Minneapolis Building Trades Council who request that it be printed in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that the request be granted and that the matter be properly referred.

There being no objection, the statement was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINNEAPOLIS BUILDING TRADES COUNCIL,
Minneapolis, Minn., March 29, 1940.

The program and position of the Minneapolis Building and Construction Trades Council regarding Works Progress Administration (W. P. A.); Public Works Administration (P. W. A.); and relief from unemployment was not correctly presented in the public press in relation to the meeting sponsored by the Associated General Contractors (A. G. C.) held at the Radisson Hotel, March 27, 1940, and attended unofficially by representative of the Building and Construction Trades Council of Minneapolis, Minn.

In order that the public may be correctly informed' the undersigned committee is authorized by the Minneapolis Building and Construction Trades Council to present its program as follows:

The council does not take the position that it is opposed to all Works Progress Administration (W. P. A.) work under any and all conditions.

We are, however, opposed to the Works Progress Administration (W. P. A.) entering the field of the building and construction industry or other trades at wages below prevailing A. F. of L. trade-union wages and conditions.

We are opposed to the sponsoring of such W. P. A. work which displaces regular civil-service employees and workers who could otherwise be employed; and any regulations which provide pauperizations as a condition for employment on W. P. A. work, and in favor of separating the W. P. A. from any relief agency, and in favor of part-time or total unemployment and adequate mechanical qualifications (consistent with good workmanship) as conditions for employment on all W. P. A. work.

For repeal of the Woodrum amendment and reestablishment of prevailing A. F. of L. trade-union wages and conditions, and 30-hour workweek on all W. P. A. work, so as to make possible the employment of union members on W. P. A. work; on this basis we support additional appropriations for W. P. A.

For an additional appropriation, in this congressional session, of at least $3,000,000,000 for the Public Works Administration to be expended for needed and worthy public-works construction and slum clearance at prevailing American Federation of Labor trade-union wages and conditions.

FEDERAL HOUSING AUTHORITY

For the continuation and expansion of the Federal Housing Authority on the basis of good-standard homes as against substandard homes and at prevailing trade-union wages and conditions.

Against any wage cuts and for establishment of more uniform wage rates to all workers by increasing the lower wage rates toward the higher wage rates, thereby enabling the workers to procure good homes and to purchase and consume more of the wealth produced, thus stimulating the market and increasing employment and business.

We sincerely believe that there is no constructive relief from unemployment by reducing wages. A cut in the higher-wage brackets results in a drive to cut all wages.

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION

Against discrimination of the youth through low wages and for establishment of prevailing trade-union wages and apprenticeship on all work in connection with the National Youth Administration.

For the enactment by the United States Congress of a law providing for a maximum 30-hour workweek, with no reduction in pay, in all industries, thereby creating jobs for many millions of adults and youths.

For liberal increases of the benefits in the various categories of social security, youth, old-age assistance, and unemployment-insurance legislation, State and Federal.

For the enactment of a State enabling act providing for establishing State, county, and municipal housing authorities, thus enabling the State and municipalities and counties to share in Federal appropriations for housing construction and slum clearance.

For a State enabling act authorizing the city of Minneapolis (as a city of first class) to issue special bonds for purposes of such public-works construction as a new city hospital, maternity and convalescent home, schools, etc., to satisfy the health, educational, and recreational needs of our city.

For retaining and improvement of the civil service and day-labor system of the city of Minneapolis.

For equal job opportunities to all workers at trade-union wages and conditions.

Against involving our country in any imperialist wars or entanglements. Let us keep our youth at home, producing wealth at trade-union wages and with a future and security for themselves instead of dying on foreign battlefields to further the interest of profit-greed war mongers and ruthless exploiters.

The Minneapolis Building and Construction Trades Council is interested in establishing decent living standards and economic security not only for all building-trades men but for all workers.

We are convinced that our country has all the required scientific knowledge, resources, and productive facilities and capacities to provide all able-bodied men, women, and youth with employment at wages which will enable them to enjoy the wealth produced and to sustain efficient and fair management and with a reduced workweek which will absorb the unemployed and legislation which will guarantee comfortable protection to the sick, aged, and incapacitated and adequate educational facilities for the youth in all branches of art and knowledge.

We earnestly solicit the support of all people to achieve this immediate and long-range program.

PROTEST OF THE BOSTON STOCK EXCHANGE—MEMORIAL

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present on behalf of myself and my colleague the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] a letter from President Yerxa, of the Boston (Mass.) Stock Exchange, addressed to the Honorable Jerome N. Frank, Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, alleging that the recent action of the New York Stock Exchange is discriminatory and oppressive in its effect upon those who are members of both the New York and Boston Stock Exchanges, and that it is inconsistent with the declared purpose of the Congress.

I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD, treated in the nature of a memorial, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

I also ask that the vote of the board of governors of the New York Stock Exchange on February 28, 1940, and which the members of the Boston Stock Exchange protest, be printed in the RECORD, and likewise referred to the same committee.

There being no objection, the letter referred to and vote of the board of governors of the New York Stock Exchange were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOSTON STOCK EXCHANGE,
March 25, 1940.

Hon. JEROME N. FRANK,
Chairman, Securities and Exchange Commission,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FRANK: On March 15 I discussed with you briefly the recent action of the New York Stock Exchange designed to stop any member who is also a member of another exchange from acting as a dealer on the other exchange in any security traded on both exchanges. To accomplish this result, the New York Stock Exchange invokes an old provision of its constitution which has never heretofore been treated as applicable to dealer activities outside of New York City.

Local exchange markets in securities also dealt in on the New York Stock Exchange are not new. For many years securities have been listed and traded on both the Boston Stock Exchange and the New York Stock Exchange. Similar situations are also true of other regional exchanges, such as Philadelphia, Chicago, and San Francisco. American Telephone and Telegraph Co. capital stock, and other well-known securities, were listed on this exchange before they were listed in New York.

As early as 1868 local interest in New England in certain securities traded on the New York and Philadelphia Stock Exchanges prompted the Boston Stock Exchange to permit trading in those securities. This practice has been continued, and at the present time a number of members of the Boston Stock Exchange who are dealers in such stocks on that exchange are members, or allied members, of the New York Stock Exchange. Furthermore, Boston members have purchased New York seats in reliance upon the fact that the New York Exchange did not question the right of firms having seats on both exchanges to conduct business on both exchanges.

Now, by the adaptation of a rule never before treated as or deemed applicable, the New York Stock Exchange proposes to force local firms holding memberships in both the New York Stock Exchange and local exchanges to give up all dealer activities on the local exchanges in securities traded both on the New York Exchange and local exchanges.

From the viewpoint of public interest, it appears impossible to justify this new interpretation. In 1936, by act of Congress, exchanges were permitted to continue then existing trading privileges. In addition, exchanges were given the right to extend trading privileges to any security listed on another exchange, whenever, by reason of local distribution, local trading activity, and otherwise, the Commission was of the opinion that a local exchange market was appropriate in the public interest.

This action, to quote the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, represented "an endeavor to create a fair field of competition among exchanges and between exchanges as a group, and the over-the-counter markets, and to allow each type of market to develop in accordance with its natural genius and consistently with the public interest."

The Commission, in subsequent decisions sanctioning local exchange markets, has given effect to the congressional purpose of encouraging free competition among exchanges. In no instance, we believe, has the New York Stock Exchange opposed applications by local exchanges for permission to maintain local secondary markets in securities listed on the New York Stock Exchange.

We are equally at a loss to understand how this action can be justified from the viewpoint of the New York Stock Exchange's own interest. During the past 5 years the proportion of the share volume on the New York Stock Exchange to the total share volume on all registered exchanges (20 in 1939) in the United States has been as follows:

1936	73.2

From these figures, released by your Commission, it appears that the New York Stock Exchange has not suffered from the activities of the other exchanges. A summary of the volume figures compiled by the 19 principal exchanges shows that New York's percentage back in 1928 was only 65.4 percent, and in 1929 only 60.5 percent.

It is our opinion that the present action of the New York Stock Exchange is discriminatory and oppressive in its effect upon those who are members of both the New York and Boston Stock Exchanges, and that it is inconsistent with the declared purpose of Congress.

Very truly yours, JOHN E. YERXA, President.

VOTE OF BOARD OF GOVERNORS

The board of governors of the New York Stock Exchange on February 28, 1940, voted to instruct the committee on member firms to enforce article XVI, section 8, of the constitution. This rule forbids members to deal on outside exchanges in stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange:

"SEC. 8. Whenever the board of governors, by the affirmative vote of 17 governors, shall determine that a member or allied member is connected, either through a partner or otherwise, with another exchange or similar organization in the city of New York which permits dealings in any securities dealt in on the exchange, or deals directly or indirectly upon such other exchange or organization, or deals publicly outside the exchange in securities dealt in on the exchange, such member or allied member may be suspended or expelled as the board may determine."

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], as modified.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I desire to discuss for a few moments some of the general features of the reciprocity-trade program, and then devote myself to the pending question, the O'Mahoney amendment.

Throughout the debate we have heard much of the legal questions involved. So many of us are lawyers that the interesting legal questions attract us. These considerations are important, but I regret that the many able Senators who have spoken have not had much to say as to the practical effect of the program in the past and its probable effect in the future.

The general dissatisfaction with the Smoot-Hawley Act gave rise to a demand for a reduction of tariff rates. It has often been said that the Democrats have not repealed the Smoot-Hawley law. Looked at superficially, this criticism can be made, but, of course, the effect of the application of the trade-agreements law by the President has been greatly to reduce tariff rates and barriers. But, Mr. President, while there is language in the Trade Agreements Act which indicates that foreign markets should be expanded, the law itself does not require a reduction of rates. In fact, it permits as great an increase of rates as it does a decrease. The Smoot-Hawley rates may be decreased 50 percent, but they may also be increased 50 percent. So it cannot be said that the statute itself requires any reduction in what are generally considered the excessive rates and prohibitive tariffs of the Smoot-Hawley Act.

But we do not disassociate the act from its administration. It could be used by a high-tariff President to bring about a great increase in the tariff rates of the United States if he could find nations that would sign such agreements, and the act certainly would give him authority to maintain the Smoot-Hawley rates without change. I sometimes think that the Secretary, and others who strongly favor this program, have overlooked the fact that the Smoot-Hawley Act rates could at least be maintained and probably could be increased by a high-tariff President if we should have the misfortune to have one in this year of 1940.

It must be remembered that under section 2b the power of termination is in the President; and every treaty which is now in existence may be terminated by a President unfavorable to the reciprocal-trade agreements. Congress alone may not abrogate or continue these agreements. The President may. I shall have more to say about this proposition a little later.

I think the administration of the law has been excellent. No one can successfully deny that under it our foreign trade has expanded without material harm to our domestic trade. Both as a manufacturing and as an agricultural exporter our prosperity has been increased by our export trade.

Taking the case of agriculture—and I have heard more from my own State of Michigan on the subject of agriculture than I have upon any other—in the Senate hearings, on pages 95 to 103, Secretary Wallace established the fact, which I should like Senators to realize, that we now utilize 28,375,000 acres to grow the agricultural commodities which are exported, and that 7,564,000 acres are used to grow the commodities which are imported into the United States. That means that if we entirely closed our ports to exports we should lose the use of 28,000,000 acres of land which are devoted to the growth of our agricultural exports. If, on the other hand, we grew upon our own soil all the products which are imported—of course, I am not including rubber, coffee, and such commodities as those—we should gain only 7,000,000 acres. We use for export four times as much land as we should gain if we grew all the products which are imported which could be grown within the borders of the United States.

These figures are for the crop year 1938–39. For some years the same ratio has held, roughly, 4 to 1.

Secretary Wallace put the matter well when he said, in substance, that by eliminating our international trade as to agriculture we should be trading dollars for quarters. We export four times as much in acres of growth as we import.

I ask that two tables dealing with this subject be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. BROWN. We have heard a great deal in my State from the dairy farmer, and we have heard much from the cattleman. The Secretary says that the American dairy farmer has 99½ percent of the American dairy market. We import one-half of 1 percent, mostly in foreign cheeses, but we are exporting on the average sufficient to cover the other one-half of 1 percent.

The Secretary informed us that the American beef producer in 1938 had 96 percent of the American beef market. It is difficult for me to understand the basis for a contention that we do not substantially have the American market for the American farmer.

But, Mr. President, my purpose today is to view this situation from a different angle. Ever since, as a young man, I adhered to the Democratic Party, I did so largely because I believed it was a party which represented the consumer interest. We have not heard much about the consumer interest in this debate. Our party has been a low-tariff party, in theory at least. Historically, the agricultural Southern States have favored low tariffs, very likely because their principal product has depended largely upon export markets. Our party in the North has had its principal strength in the great cities—New York, Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, and in later years Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, and Los Angeles—most of them, however, for the entire period since the Civil War. They are the foundation of the Democratic strength in the North. Why is this true? Shallow thinkers attribute it to political organizations, such as the Tammany organization in New York, such as the Kelly-Nash organization in Chicago; but the fact is that political organization in the larger cities is the result, and not the cause, of this situation. Historically—and I think on sound reason—the Democratic Party has been dominant in the great cities of the country because it has been a low-tariff consumer party, interested in preventing runaway prices, in preventing the upbuilding of great fortunes through prohibitive tariffs which pour the earnings of the common man into the pockets, not of the Government by taxation, but of the producers of consumptive goods through excessive prices.

I am not attempting to particularize today. I am generalizing and talking about the larger aspects of the situation. The South is interested in export trade largely because of its cotton; and the industrial areas of the North, crowded into cities, are interested in sound economics because the result of sound economics is reasonable prices. To these groups our party in recent years has added a large part of the farm population. Our party has recognized that high agricultural tariffs have not resulted in better prices to the farmer, who is 90 percent dependent upon the domestic market; and, recognizing these conditions, the Agricultural Adjustment Act with its parity payments, the soil-conservation program, and other methods have been used to attack the farm problem. These groups form the bone and sinew of the Democratic Party of today.

This brings me to a consideration of the result of the application of what I term the rather innocuous Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. It has been advantageous to the people of the United States, not because the law provides lower tariffs, but because a great statesman, completely committed to the view that low tariffs result in international trade, has dominated the policy which has brought about lower tariffs through the permissive language of the statute. I again say that in the hands of an administration committed to high tariffs the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act could be an effective instrument in perpetuating and probably even in increasing the exorbitant rates of the Hawley-Smoot Act.

The reciprocal trade agreements law is a good one, not because of any particular virtue in the act itself, but because of its capable administration.

Mr. President, I have heard a great deal of the cost-of-production theory of tariff making. Like many other theories, it has an appeal to the unthinking. Carried to its logical conclusion, cost of production means that Costa Rica's bananas could be raised in Michigan or in Maine by hothouse methods, and that a tariff should be established representing the difference between the cost of production under the warm, fetid climate of Central and South America and production by high-pressure methods in the cold country along our Canadian border. Of course, northern United States cannot produce bananas, and Cuba cannot produce Vermont maple sirup. The consuming public—and that means all of us—will be best served when, within reasonable limitations which I shall attempt to suggest, we produce the commodities needed by our people where they can be most economically produced.

Our Nation is closer to being a self-contained economic unit than is any other large nation in the world. Consequently, it follows that we need pay less attention to national defense and to the production of essentials which we cannot with economy produce within our own borders than is the case with any other great nation of the world. I shall not take the time to compare the United States with Germany, with France, with Russia, with the British Empire, or with any other nation. I assert what every man knows to be a fact—that our natural resources, our productive power, both agriculturally and industrially speaking, stands without challenge as the leader of the entire world.

I do not mean that essentials which we need are not produced in other countries, but most of them are fairly close at hand. It is but natural, therefore, that we should take the lead, because it is safer for us than for any other nation to do so.

There was sound reason for the protective industrial tariffs of our earlier days, and there is reason for some of the many rates now in existence. Such rates are often necessary for the purpose of maintaining in a particular area an industry which, but for protection, might languish and die. There is sound reason for a tariff policy that will enable us to supply our consumptive demands in case of war. This is in part the justification for our sugar policy. Certainly there is much merit in our policy toward our friendly neighbor to the north, which is our best customer, and which supplies us with much of the raw material we need, such as, for example, nickel, which is not produced in abundance in the United States, and is a necessary war material. But, in the main, the interests of our country will best be served by a policy which will bring to our people the necessities and the luxuries of life at reasonable prices. This is the main purpose of the administration of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

Search the record of the hearings before the House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee, and it will be found that very little was said by the consumer and a great deal was said by the producer. The average consumer throughout the United States spends a few hundred dollars per year for his food, his clothing, and other things to supply his various wants. Therefore no particular individual in this class has a great financial stake in the controversy; but the Senate of the United States must not forget that there are 130,000,000 consumers who, either in person or by proxy, walk to the grocery store and the butcher shop each day of the year.

The best statement I heard on the subject was that presented by Mrs. Harris T. Baldwin, first vice president of the National League of Women Voters. Mrs. Baldwin presented the views of the American Association of University Women, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, the national board of the Young Women's Christian Association, the National Council of Jewish Women, the National Women's Trade Union League of America, and the Service Star Legion, Inc., as well as her own organization. In the statement of Dr. Caroline F. Ware, representing the American Association of University Women, presented by Mrs. Baldwin, I find the following remarkable declaration:

> The stake of American consumers in a satisfactory tariff-making procedure is very real. As consumers we tend to favor a program which minimizes barriers to trade, because we want to acquire the goods which we need on the most favorable terms. By expanding markets abroad for the things which can best be made at home and buying therewith things which we cannot well produce or in which our advantage for production is less we gain the full advantage of our best skills.

She estimates the burden placed upon the American consumer by the tariff by saying that something like 10 percent of the average expenditures for food on the part of the New York City wage earners and clerical workers in 1935 was attributable to the tariff. She estimates that the cost of the tariff to the average farm family was $108 a year—that is, money going out of the farm family and into the hands of the producers of various commodities in the United States—$81 for goods used in the family living on the farm, and $27 for goods used in farm production. In other words, our tariff policy, according to this well-informed woman, cost the average farm family $108 a year.

Mrs. Baldwin said:

> If the cost-of-production theory in tariff making is pursued to its logical conclusion, it means the use of the tariff to eliminate all competitive advantages among countries, and therefore practically to prohibit imports. This is the opposite of the purpose of the trade-agreement program, which is to stimulate trade.

The women of America face the everyday task of supplying the essential wants of the American family, and I think these representatives of millions of American women represent a voice to which we should listen in fixing tariff rates.

The views of the National Women's Trade Union League of America are most interesting. The executive board is on record in favor of the trade-agreements program. Mrs. J. A. Stone, chairman of the committee, in her statement presented to the Finance Committee, points out that of the 50,000,000 gainfully employed persons in the United States, it is estimated that approximately 5,000,000 are engaged in the so-called protected industries. She thinks the correct figure is closer to two and one-half million. To my mind, she thoroughly explodes the theory that excessive tariffs are material factors in maintaining high wage standards. In her statement on pages 507 and 508 of the hearings she shows that the average annual wages in 1937 in the protected industries did not measure up to those in the unprotected industries. Her figures, taken from the Census of Manufactures, show the following wages were paid in the protected industries listed:

	Average annual wage in 1937
Cigarettes	$930
Cigars	670
Garment industries:
Shirts and collars	604
Furnishings and miscellaneous apparel	794
Fabric gloves	604
Leather gloves	753
Textiles:
Woolen and worsted	1,001
Silk and rayon manufactures	790
Cotton manufactures	745
Dyeing and finishing	1,010

Compare these figures with the following wages paid in unprotected industries:

	Average annual wage in 1937
Automobiles	$1,575
Agricultural implements, including tractors	1,562
Petroleum refining	1,692
Sewing machines and attachments	1,506
Typewriters and parts	1,236

In September 1939 the average hourly wage in all manufacturing industries in the United States, Mrs. Stone points out, was 64.3 cents. She points out that this is 11.1 cents higher than the highest hourly wage in the group of protected industries from which I read, but that the wages paid in the important industries of automobiles, rubber, agricultural implements, cash registers, typewriters, petroleum refining, are far above the wages paid in the protected industries, and in all these industries there is no tariff protection. This, it seems to me, pretty thoroughly demolishes the theory that protection means high wages with respect to the particular industries involved.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I merely wish to observe, in line with what the Senator is saying, that in my State there is an industry which, during the lowest period of depression, went into production. It produces potash, and competes with potash from foreign countries. It has had no protection, but the highest wages paid in my State are paid by the potash industry.

Mr. BROWN. I thank the Senator for that contribution, which is thoroughly in line with the statistics furnished me by the women's trade-union organization.

Mr. President, favoring as I do greater export trade, and recognizing that our Nation both industrially and agriculturally is greatly benefited by the removal of excessive tariff walls, I address myself to the question: What will be the effect of the enactment of the pending joint resolution? Two answers must be considered. If my party shall be successful in 1940, I think the measure now before us will be entirely satisfactory, not because of any definite policy laid down in it, but because of its intelligent administration. If the opposition party shall be successful in 1940, the act may be used, as I have heretofore indicated, to raise rates.

The Senator from Missouri implied yesterday that that was not true. Certainly immediately upon the taking of office by a high protectionist President he could abrogate 17 of the 20 existing trade treaties on 6 months' notice.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Am I correct in assuming, now, from the two questions the Senator has just propounded and then answered, that his party is going to be unsuccessful in the coming election?

Mr. BROWN. No; I think I covered that pretty well in the earlier part of my argument. I am confident that it will be successful.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is supporting the pending amendment, is he not?

Mr. BROWN. No; the Senator from Michigan is not supporting the pending amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Michigan is not supporting the pending amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I was thinking the Senator was making a very good argument against it, and I could not understand, as I had been informed that he was supporting the amendment.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator should get his information from me and not from someone else.

Mr. NORRIS. I admit that. [Laughter.] I shall do that. I am glad to be corrected.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator has stated that a new President could abrogate all these agreements on 6 months' notice. Does not the act provide that the President may abrogate them without any notice whatever?

Mr. BROWN. Under certain special conditions he can do that, but, generally speaking, 6 months' notice of termination is required.

Mr. ADAMS. Is there not a specific authorization to the President to terminate them at any time?

Mr. BROWN. Not without the existence of certain conditions. Generally speaking, 6 months' notice of termination is required.

Mr. President, if a high-protectionist President should happen to go into power next January, by July 20 all the trade-agreement treaties, except those with Venezuela, Turkey, and the United Kingdom, could be terminated at the will of the President. Immediately upon that happening the tariff rates could be "hiked" upward 50 percent.

Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator from Missouri is not present. He took the opposite view yesterday.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator from Missouri is present. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. I am sorry the Senator was not listening to what I said.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is not what the Senator said. The Senator said the Senator from Missouri was not present, and the Senator from Missouri was listening closely enough to hear the Senator make that statement.

Mr. BROWN. I am so used to seeing the genial face of the Senator from Missouri at his place in front of me that when he went somewhere else I did not see him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. After the statement of the Senator from Michigan to the Senator from Nebraska a few moments ago that he was not supporting the amendment, I was not interested in taking issue with the Senator from Michigan on anything he might say about my argument yesterday, because I never wish to argue with a man who is going to vote with me.

Mr. BROWN. I know the Senator wants to be right in his statements on the floor——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator from Missouri was right.

Mr. BROWN. When he said that a high-protectionist President could not bring about an increase in the tariff rates, I think he made a statement to the Senate which is not in accordance with the facts; and that is the point to which I wanted to call attention.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. Let me call the Senator's attention to the provision of the act which led to my inquiry. This is the flat statement in the act:

> The President may at any time terminate any such proclamation in whole or in part.

That is an unqualified authorization.

Mr. BROWN. I will say to the Senator that I do not think that is in accord with the practice which has been established.

Mr. ADAMS. I am speaking of the authority, not the practice.

Mr. BROWN. The agreements themselves generally provide for 6 months' notice of termination, except in the case of special conditions to which I have referred.

Mr. President, I do not approach the problem raised by the O'Mahoney amendment without some misgiving. I wish we could write into this law a provision which would prevent a high-protectionist President from abrogating any of the trade treaties without the joint consent of the House and Senate.

I believe, as I stated yesterday in a colloquy with the Senator from Wyoming, that stability in tariff rates is just about as important as justice in tariff rates. I think that industry in the United States cannot face the immediate future with any confidence if it knows that a high-protectionist President could come into office and in 6 months tear down completely the entire tariff-rate structure which has been set up. But that is the way we leave the situation.

Mr. President, I think any businessman who is concerned and whose business is affected by tariff duties will advise that stability in tariff rates is just as important, if not more important, than absolute justice in tariff rates. Of course, neither can be completely achieved. But business should know over a reasonable period of time what it must face in tariff rates and duties. I think stability in policy is paramount. I quote from Professor Taussig:

> The country can adjust itself to extreme protection, or high protection, or moderate protection, or even to free trade, and can go on prosperously under any one of them. But constant vacillations are a great evil. They are not an intolerable evil, for the simple reason that the influence of the protective system on our industrial system, whether for good or ill, is not so far reaching as most people think. But an influence it has, and that influence is particularly bad insofar as it is inconstant and uncalculable. Much the wiser course, if a protective system must be accepted as part of the settled order of things, would be to shape it in such form that it would endure for a considerable stretch of time; to eliminate the extreme and vulnerable features, and make a serious and honest endeavor to establish a regime with which the community might remain content.

I agree with the reasoning of the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who now occupies the chair, in his speech made yesterday in that I could not vote for the legislation if it were not for the emergency conditions which face the world today. After considerable consultation with those who are experts upon this subject, I have come to a realization that it is necessary for the executive department to have the power to change tariff rates, a little up or a little down, to embargo this article or that article, and to do so quickly, because of the uncertain conditions which exist in the world today.

I serve notice now that if I am here when this measure comes up again, and world conditions are more stable than they are at the present time, I shall be among those who will vote to recapture the power which we have given to the State Department to make tariff rates. But I am firmly convinced, Mr. President, that at least for the period of this emergency we must grant this power so that it may be used quickly and effectively, and that cannot be done if we require either Senate ratification of the agreements or if we require concurrent action on the part of the House and the Senate.

I regret that I cannot go along with the Senator from Wyoming in his amendment as it is now drafted. I want to call the attention of Senators who may think the amendment should be adopted to two or three matters. First, there is no question that action of the Rules Committee in the House, if the Rules Committee were so minded, could prevent consideration of a trade agreement sent to that body by the President. If the O'Mahoney amendment should be adopted in the Senate, any trade agreement submitted for ratification by a majority vote could be filibustered out of existence.

A further objection, as I see it, is that the amendment as drafted would permit amendments to an agreement. It is not a case of a proposed agreement merely being voted up or down, as is true with respect to the reorganization orders, which are sent to Congress by the President, but, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] pointed out, we again would have the spectacle of a fight over rates on the floor of the Senate or in the committee where the matter was being considered.

I myself have endeavored most assiduously, Mr. President, to bring about an agreement whereby the 16 or 17 Democratic Senators representing States west of the Mississippi River could be given some opportunity to have the agreements considered in the Finance Committee or upon the floor of the Senate. I have labored with high authorities in the executive department in the effort to bring about that kind of a compromise. I have labored with the chairman of the Finance Committee. I have done so because I thought that western Senators were entitled to consideration, but I have been unable to bring about such a compromise.

I have presented an amendment which I thought might be the basis of such a compromise, but after careful consideration and going into the matter thoroughly I have become convinced that as a practical matter at the present time I must support the pending joint resolution as written. Therefore, I am not supporting the O'Mahoney amendment, and I intend to resist any changes in the trade-agreements extension measure that is before us, and to vote for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], as modified, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I make a point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. McNARY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McNARY. Have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have been ordered.

The clerk will state the pending amendment for the information of the Senate, and then proceed to call the roll.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 2. No foreign-trade agreement hereafter entered into under the authority delegated to the President by such section 350, as amended, no amendatory or supplementary agreement hereafter entered into under such section, and no duties and other import restrictions specified in a proclamation issued by the President to carry out any such foreign-trade agreement or any such amendatory or supplementary agreement, shall take effect until the Congress by law has specifically approved such agreement and the duties and other import restrictions so specified to carry out such agreement; and no notice of termination under section 2 (b) of such act of June 12, 1934, shall take effect with respect to any foreign-trade agreement, or any amendatory or supplementary agreement, hereafter entered into under such section 350, until the Congress by law has specifically approved such notice of termination.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RADCLIFFE], who is unavoidably detained. It is my understanding that if he were able to be present, he would vote "nay." I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], who is unavoidably absent from the Senate, and who, if present, would vote "yea" and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. NYE. On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS]. I understand that if he were present and voting he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. MINTON. On this question the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS]. I am advised that if the Senator from Montana were present he would vote "yea" and that if the Senator from Florida were present he would vote "nay."

I announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE], the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RADCLIFFE], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] are detained from the Senate on important public business.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are detained in Government departments.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is unavoidably detained.

The Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL]; the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN]. I am advised that if present and voting, the Senator from California and the Senator from New Mexico would vote "yea" and the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Missouri would vote "nay."

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] is absent because of illness. He is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY]. I am advised that if the Senator from New Jersey were present he would vote "yea" and that the Senator from Illinois, if present, would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 44, as follows:

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I have an amendment on the desk, which I now call up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 2. Effective on the date of enactment of this act, section 2 of such act of June 12, 1934, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d) No foreign trade agreement hereafter entered into under section 1 of this act shall take effect until such agreement shall have been approved by the Senate of the United States."

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the Senate has already voted that it does not wish to have trade agreements ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. I have assumed that perhaps that vote was due to the fact that a two-thirds vote appealed to Senators as an overly exacting requirement. The Senate has just rejected an amendment providing that before trade agreements go into effect they shall be ratified or approved by both the Senate and the House. I assume that the Senate, by that vote, is concurring with the action of the House, which some weeks ago, by a vote, declined to exercise the right or accept the obligation of passing upon trade agreements.

Mr. President, I wish to place before the Senate fairly and squarely the question whether or not the Senate wishes to have any voice in these matters. My amendment would not validate an invalid agreement, whether it be a treaty or an agreement. All it provides is that a reciprocal-trade agreement shall not go into effect, even though normally valid, unless a majority of the Senate shall approve the agreement. It attaches a condition to the effectiveness of the agreement. It does not add anything to the validity of the agreement. If the agreement be not valid, it would not become valid merely because a majority of the Senate should approve it.

In the reorganization measure the Senate made a somewhat similar provision, that reorganization orders should not go into effect until approved by one House. They do not have to be approved by both Houses. If either House approves a reorganization order, it goes into effect. This amendment merely presents, in a simplified form, that condition, and provides that trade agreements shall not become effective unless a majority vote in the Senate approves.

Those who sponsor the trade-agreement program have taken the position that submission of trade agreements to Congress or either branch of Congress would wreck the program. This amendment would merely provide that an agreement, as a whole, should come before the Senate, and the vote would be "yea" or "nay." No opportunity to offer amendments would be given but merely a vote of approval or disapproval of the particular agreement.

I have not been able to adjust myself to the view which seems to be entertained by the executive department, that the Senate of the United States is incompetent to pass judgment upon a tariff act in any respect. The amendment in the form I have offered it is reduced to a minimum. It would simply afford the Senate an opportunity to say whether or not the charges which are made against the Senate, that they are incompetent to pass judgment upon tariff matters, that they will wreck a program, if submitted to them, are true; whether or not the Senate shall plead guilty to the charge of incompetence which is made against them.

I do not propose to argue the matter at length, but simply to submit it. However, one suggestion should be added, namely, that when we pass the joint resolution we shall be delegating to the administration power to reorganize the tariffs of the United States. We are going to delegate that power by a majority vote. We cannot recall the power except by a two-thirds vote. This amendment would preserve to the Senate its right by a majority vote to retain and conserve its constitutional power to prevent tariff changes unless the majority of the Senate concur. If we pass the joint resolution without some such provision, it will require a two-thirds vote to recapture the power.

That, Senators, in substance, is what appeals to me as to the desirability of this amendment. As I say, it involves the expression by Senators of confidence or lack of confidence in themselves.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK of Missouri in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum, and, in the meantime, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks for the yeas and nays. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll for a quorum.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Davis	Johnson, Colo.	Reynolds

The Senator from Vermont and the Senator from North Dakota are unavoidably detained, and the Senator from Maine is necessarily absent from the city.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] is absent because of illness.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE], the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RADCLIFFE], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] are detained from the Senate on important public business.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is unavoidably detained.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is detained in one of the Government departments.

The Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL]. I am advised that if present and voting, the Senator from California would vote "yea," and the Senator from Georgia would vote "nay."

So the amendment of Mr. ADAMS was rejected.

SPECIAL ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL MATTHEW F. M'GUIRE

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, at noon today I took advantage of the opportunity to go to the Department of Justice, where I had the privilege of witnessing the swearing in of Special Assistant Attorney General of the United States Mr. Matthew F. McGuire. There were a number of Members of the Congress there from both the Senate and the House. Among the Senators present were Messrs. MCCARRAN, MEAD, GILLETTE, HATCH, and BANKHEAD.

I should like to have printed in the RECORD at this juncture in my remarks a statement in reference to the legal experience and services of Special Assistant Attorney General McGuire with the Department of Justice over a duration of 6 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

Special Assistant Attorney General Matthew F. McGuire, recently nominated by President Roosevelt and confirmed by the Senate as the Assistant to the Attorney General, was sworn in today at 12 o'clock noon in the office of Attorney General Robert H. Jackson.

Mr. McGuire will now occupy the third highest position in the Department of Justice.

Serving under Attorneys General Homer Cummings, Frank Murphy, and Robert H. Jackson, Mr. McGuire has advanced from the ranks to one of the major positions in the Federal Government. His advancement within 6 years from special attorney to the third highest position in the Department of Justice is definite evidence of Attorney General Jackson's policy of promotion by merit. It marks another important step in the development of the merit system instituted by the Attorney General in the Department of Justice.

Reared in Boston and educated in Boston public schools, Mr. McGuire was graduated from Holy Cross College in 1921 with a bachelor of arts degree. Later he attended the law school of Boston University, graduating with a bachelor of laws degree in 1926. For many years he engaged in the private practice of law.

Mr. McGuire entered upon his duties in the Department of Justice in 1934 as special attorney in the Criminal Division. He helped in the drafting of the Federal crime laws of the Seventy-third Congress, enacted to curb crime during the wave of kidnapings and major robberies of 1933, 1934, and 1935.

Later Mr. McGuire was promoted as an assistant to Joseph B. Keenan, the Assistant to former Attorney General Homer Cummings, and supervised personnel and related matters in the Department of Justice. Upon the resignation of Mr. Keenan, Mr. McGuire was named as the Acting Assistant Attorney General.

Early in 1939 he was named by former Attorney General Frank Murphy to the newly created post of Special Assistant Attorney General. In this capacity he served as liaison officer between the Attorney General and the Congress, and other agencies and departments of the Government.

Mr. McGuire also handled numerous confidential, special legal, and administrative matters in the Department of Justice during the past 6 years.

The duties of the office of Special Assistant Attorney General will be combined with those of his new important post.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I have on the desk an amendment, which I offer and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 8, after "1940," it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

Provided, That no commodity or article shall be included in any foreign-trade agreement entered into which permits the entry into American markets of products of workers, farmers, or miners of foreign countries at total landed costs, all tariff duties paid, which total costs are less than the cost of production or wholesale selling price of competitive products of American workers, miners, or farmers where such American products are commercially available.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, this amendment would do for the people of America what foreign governments have done for their people. This amendment would insure to labor in America that those labor standards and labor wages fought for and accomplished through nearly a century of trial by the toilers of America would not be jeopardized or reduced. This amendment would make certain that American-produced commodities from the field, the mine, and the factory would not be brought into competition with commodities produced abroad under conditions of much lower wages, working conditions far inferior to ours, and at costs of production so much less than our costs that our commodities of a similar kind could not compete with the foreign products.

Mr. President, in the Emergency Tariff Act of May 1921, carried over under the permanent Tariff Act of September 1922, there was included the antidumping provision. It provides that where the purchase price or exporter's sales price on shipments to the United States is proved to be less than the foreign market value—or, in the absence of such value, than the cost of production—there shall be paid on such imports, in addition to the regular duties, a special dumping duty in an amount equal to such difference.

At that time, and when we enacted that tariff law, we were looking forward to that which actually happened, namely, after the World War there was a natural tendency, and the practice was carried out, of dumping upon the American market and upon the American people war-produced commodities, or commodities produced under war conditions, produced so cheaply abroad, produced so cheaply in the Western and the Eastern Hemispheres, that American labor and American factories and the fields of America could not compete with them; so we sought to protect the American commodity.

Perhaps the most striking instance of such legislation as it has been recognized and accomplished in other countries is that embodied in part II of the British Safeguarding of Industries Act. That act provides that an antidumping duty of 33⅓ percent may be imposed upon the imports of such products as are being offered for sale in the United Kingdom at prices which, by reason of the depreciation of the currency of the country of manufacture, are below the prices at which similar goods can be profitably manufactured in the United Kingdom. The check provided against the possible abuse of such means of emergency relief is characteristic of the temper of British legislation generally. Before such an antidumping duty is ordered, the committee set up by the British Board of Trade must be satisfied on two points: First, that by reason of the continued imports of the particular product, employment in any industry in the United Kingdom is being, or is likely to be, seriously affected; and, second, that production in the industry manufacturing similar goods in the United Kingdom is being carried on with reasonable efficiency and economy.

Mr. President, that is the aim and object of this amendment, to the end that our people and our toilers and our producers shall be protected against slave-made and slave-produced commodities from abroad. I say, and I do not think the statement will be successfully contradicted, that we are facing a condition under which, at the close of the present strife abroad, we shall have dumped upon the markets of America competitive products the like of which is produced in this country by American labor. When that condition comes about, American labor and the American producer must of necessity face competition which, if tariffs are lowered, will be serious and disastrous to American life in general.

Today we have—and I use one commodity as an illustration—what is known as the reciprocal-trade treaty between this country and Brazil, affecting manganese. Manganese is one of the most important minerals to the steel industry of this country. Indeed, it is a very important mineral in time of war. In a trade treaty between this country and Brazil, we reduced the tariff on manganese 50 percent; but what was the result? When we entered into that treaty with Brazil on manganese, we also extended to all other countries of the world what were known as the most-favored-nation provisions. The result has been that today we are receiving cargo after cargo of manganese, not from Brazil, the country with which we entered into the reciprocal-trade treaty, but from the Russian Republic.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VAN NUYS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. LUNDEEN. If the able Senator will permit me, certainly we should develop the manganese resources of America. We should not permit imports of this vital mineral, which is a war essential. Why not develop the manganese resources of our own America—why be dependent upon other nations? There can be no answer to that question but one answer, and that is develop the manganese of the United States and the manganese of the Western Hemisphere, and I hope we may soon call that hemisphere an American Hemisphere. I should like to say to the distinguished Senator that it is no longer fashionable, it seems, to protect American labor. We must first think of the coolie and the Hindu—anybody but American labor. We must put foreigners first and Americans last. That seems to be the slogan of the day. I am in hearty accord with the able argument of the Senator from Nevada—I am with the Senator in his position.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I am grateful to the Senator for his support in this matter.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The amendment proposed by the able Senator from Nevada is, in my judgment, of great importance. The able Senator directed attention to the fact that under the operations of the reciprocal-trade agreement made with Brazil, manganese was reaching the United States from Russia. I wish to observe that the manganese imported into the United States from Russia is produced in Russia by what we would call "slave labor," but in Russia it would be called "forced labor," receiving probably 45 or 50 cents a day. Thus, under the operation of the particular agreement to which the Senator refers, manganese mines of the United States are brought into competition with "forced" labor, which is a euphemistic term for "slave" labor, which is paid not to exceed 50 cents a day.

If the Senator will further permit me, I am sure that no person who indulges in the luxury of thinking believes that the United States will be engaged in any war. That is the one thing which cannot and will not happen. Yet, as responsible officials, we should at least make a helpful gesture toward those things which would arm and equip our country if we should, through some odd mischance, do what is conceded on all sides to be the impossible thing, namely, enter into a war.

Senators will not forget that during the World War we were importing manganese ores from Brazil because we had failed to accord to our manganese miners an opportunity to develop our own resources. Senators will remember the mysterious fate of the Cyclops. She sank in March 1918 without trace. On board were her crew of some 200 or more, and some passengers. She was bound for an American port, laden with manganese ores.

While the loss of the Cyclops was tragic and caused poignant grief to the relatives of those who went down to the airless meadows of the cavernous deep, I advert to its loss to illustrate how feeble a policy it is that would depend on foreign countries for an adequate supply of manganese. As all Senators know, manganese is needed, absolutely required, in order to make not only weapons of war but many articles of commerce and industry.

Some may say, Why do we not develop our manganese resources? We have ample manganese resources in the United States. The State of Virginia has for 150 or more years given to the world great statesmen. It is well worthy of the study of biologists to determine how and in what way so many eminent statesmen could come from one State; and on my left now sits one of the greatest the State has ever produced, Senator CARTER GLASS. Virginia has some manganese resources; the able Senator on my right [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] indicates that Minnesota has manganese resources, and, indeed, many States of the West, including Arizona, have manganese resources; but we cannot and should not ask miners to produce manganese in competition with laborers in Russia who receive 50 cents a day—and for 12 hours' labor, not 8 hours' labor.

Mr. President, I commend the Senator from Nevada for his foresight and courage in offering this amendment. If we are to have reciprocal-trade treaties or agreements, let us see to it that there do not come into the United States under them goods, wares, merchandise, and commodities which may be produced by forced or slave labor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I would prefer to yield in just a few minutes, if the Senator will pardon me. I wish to develop the thought I was starting upon, and also to develop the thought expressed by the able Senator from Arizona by bringing to the attention of the Senate a very salient matter with reference to the importation of the particular commodity I have now mentioned. Please understand that I am not dwelling upon this commodity particularly with reference to the pending amendment, but I wish to bring to the Senate the thought that while we entered into a trade treaty with Brazil and entered into no trade treaty with Russia, the most-favored-nation provision read into the treaty with Brazil gave Russia the opportunity to bring into this country cargoes of manganese, so much so that she put Brazil practically out of the picture.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. Let me conclude this thought. Without any treaty Russia comes in with its manganese. We had no trade treaty with Russia touching that subject at all, but Russia, taking advantage of what our State Department read into the Brazilian treaty, comes in with her cargoes of manganese, produced under slave conditions.

I now yield, if I may, to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely wish to express my approval of the amendment. When the wage and hour bill was before the Senate I offered an amendment similar to this, to prevent the importation of goods which were made under conditions below the standards we set in the wage and hour law. It seems to me that if the rising wage trend in this country is to continue, and if we are to achieve the full promise of American life and a better life, and better conditions of living for our people, we must keep out goods produced under conditions below the standards we set. I believe that if the aim of the Senator from Nevada were to be accomplished it would be the greatest single positive step which government could take to increase employment and get some work for Americans.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, continuing with the general thought, I wish again to emphasize that I only brought the manganese incident forward for the purpose of illustrating the point I am trying to make with the Senate.

Differing from the British only in form—I refer now to the British effort to protect the laborers of Great Britain—has been the legislation adopted by a number of continental countries, principally Belgium, France, and Spain. By the Belgian Emergency Tariff Act of November 1921, increases of from 100 to 300 percent of the usual duties were imposed upon certain classes of German manufactured goods entering into direct competition with Belgian industries. Textile, chemical, and mechanical products were the principal classes of goods affected.

Earlier in 1921, France added to her general and minimum tariff system a new scale of duties, providing for rates often double, and higher than the previous upper level, and in general averaging about four times as high as the minimum rates of the French tariff, which are those enjoyed by most European countries. This new scale of duties has been applicable mainly to the products of Germany and Austria, which had lost their treaty status with France as a result of the war. As in the case of Belgium, these maximum duties were officially declared to have for their purpose the protection of French labor and industries against severe competition from countries with depreciated currencies.

Mr. President, an important measure enacted by the British Parliaments is the safeguarding of British industries bill, which provides for the imposition of a duty of 33⅓ percent ad valorem. I have drawn to the attention of the Senate the fact that the main object—in fact, the sole object and aim—was to protect British labor, because Great Britain was confronted with a situation which she appreciated, namely, that she would have to have the dole to take care of her toilers, just as we have W. P. A. now to take care of our unemployed.

Right here, Mr. President, I want to bring to the attention of the Senate something that transpired in the Senate only a few days ago, which to my mind is directly applicable, and shows that my amendment, or some similar provision, should go into the pending measure. A few days ago we added to the agricultural appropriation measure $212,000,000 to pay a part—only a percentage, if you please—of parity to the farmers of the United States. There seems to me to be no rhyme or reason for taking money from the Treasury of the United States to pay a subsidy to those who produce the necessities of life, and at the same time open the door to those who come into competition with us from abroad, and who bring into this country slave-produced commodities, and thereby tear down the domestic prices to less than the cost of production.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I think the Senator's application of the appropriation carried in the agricultural appropriation measure is quite apt. Also, why should we not include the $185,000,000 appropriated in the same measure for surplus commodities and the Stamp Act?

Mr. McCARRAN. I am very glad that the Senator from Oregon gave that most apt contribution, because it is directly in line with what I am attempting to say, and illustrates my thought. In other words, Mr. President, we are here subsidizing the producer so that production may go forward with a return of at least the cost of production on some assured basis to those who produce the necessities of life, and at the same time we are turning around and opening the door to permit unequal competition with those who produce here by taking down the protection that affords our producers some degree of security.

The amendment which I have offered to the Trade Agreements Act would prevent the inclusion of any commodity or article in any foreign trade agreement if the total landed costs, including the duty, are less than the cost of production or wholesale selling price of competitive American products, if the latter are commercially available.

Let me dwell on that for just a moment. If a commodity is not commercially available here, certainly the principle would not apply. We have placed upon the free list many commodities with which we enter into no competition. We put coffee on the free list, we put tea on the free list. We at one time had many commodities on the free list because we did not produce them in competition. However, by my amendment I seek to protect only those commodities which our farmers, our factory workers, our toilers, and our industrialists endeavor to produce, and thus keep American workers employed.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I hesitate to intrude further, but I simply wish to say that under the present Tariff Act 66 percent of imports are on the free list.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am glad to have that contribution from the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. President, the effect of this amendment would be in complete accord with the principle of equalizing the competitive standing of foreign goods in the American market with domestic goods. It would not prevent the reduction of duties on goods if the existing duty more than offsets the difference in cost of production plus landing charges exclusive of the duty. It would prevent the reduction in duty (1) if the existing duty fails to equalize the competitive status in the American market as a result of low foreign prices, and (2) if the existing duty merely brought the foreign cost plus landing charges upon an equal basis with the American cost of production or wholesale price.

This principle is the same as the one previously recognized by section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930 whereby tariffs could be increased or lowered for the purpose of putting the imported articles on a basis of equality with American goods in the domestic market. If the articles are not competitive, are on the free list, or are not commercially available in the United States, they would not be affected by this amendment.

There should be no objection to this amendment by the supporters of the trade agreements in view of numerous expressions made by officials charged with the administration of that act.

On page 144 of Publication No. 704, Press Releases, volume 12, No. 283 of the Department of State, dated March 2, 1935, appears the following statement:

> One of the major objectives sought, in setting up this extensive administrative machinery, is the careful consideration of the economic and social consequences of each concession upon the national economy of the United States.

On page 145 of the same document appears the following:

> On the other hand, it was found that on a number of products, some of which are not produced in the United States, the maximum permissible reduction in the rates of duty established by the Tariff Act of 1930 could be made without affecting adversely any domestic industry. On still other products moderate concessions could be made without increasing unduly the competition between domestic and imported goods.

A brief analysis of concessions which are in the nature of reductions in rates of duty indicates the possibility of removing trade restrictions without danger to domestic industries.

In a statement made before the Committee on Ways and Means on January 17, 1940, Mr. Henry Grady, Assistant Secretary of State, said:

Wherever concessions have been granted involving downward adjustments of tariff rates, extreme care and caution have been exercised. * * *

I may repeat what has often been stated, that there is no intention whatever to administer this program in a manner to jeopardize employment, working conditions, and the living standards of American workers; on the contrary, it is their improvement that is sought. * * *

These quotations show sufficiently what is the alleged policy of the State Department and the other agencies participating in the selection of items for inclusion in trade agreements. With this avowed policy the proposed amendment does not conflict. The amendment would impose no additional burdens on these agencies if the extreme care and caution which they allegedly exercise in selecting items for concessions are actually adhered to. Only if the alleged care and caution are not really exercised would the amendment lay an increased burden upon these agencies. It is to be presumed that the care and caution so widely advertised is actually observed in practice.

The amendment would not prevent duty reductions if they could be made without injury to American workers, farmers, and industries. If the agencies in question are concerned with avoidance of such injury and if they practice what they allege they can have nothing to fear from this amendment which would merely give their concern a concrete legal sanction.

According to a report by the United States Tariff Commission, revised copy, January, 1940, showing duty reductions made by reciprocal-trade agreements up to November 1940, reductions had been made on 42 percent of all the items on which we have a duty. The average reductions were 39 percent. In view of the fact that no agreements have been made with Japan, Russia, Germany, Italy, Argentina, Spain, Chile, Mexico, China, India, Australia, Egypt, Austria, Greece, Poland, Norway, and other countries which in 1937 supplied us with nearly one-half of our dutiable imports, the reductions already made are very impressive.

The fact is that while the agencies charged with the selection of items for bargaining allegedly exercised great care and caution and avowedly had no intention of endangering domestic industries or jeopardizing employment, numerous concessions were granted on items which we import principally or in great part from countries other than the one with which an agreement was made. That was the reason why a moment ago I referred by way of illustration to the Russian action, the Russian importation to this country based on the Brazilian treaty. In this manner the third and fourth countries received the benefits of our reductions without giving us concessions in return.

Thus in the agreements with Canada we reduced our duty on certain types of pickled or salted fish by 50 percent while, of our total imports of some $3,000,000, less than 45 percent came from Canada. Other countries supplying the remainder of these fish thus received a free reduction in duty of 50 percent. We also granted Canada a 50-percent reduction in duty on whisky, even though, of $53,000,000 of imports in 1937, only 40 percent came from Canada. Scotland obtained a free ride. On ferromanganese we granted Canada a reduction of 45 percent, but in 1937 we imported from Canada only about a third of our total imports of $1,221,000.

In our agreement with the United Kingdom we gave a reduction of 38 percent on furniture other than chairs; but of total imports of $1,020,000 in 1937 only 31 percent came from the United Kingdom. Similarly, we granted a reduction of 33 percent on woven fabrics other than cotton, although of total imports of $8,500,000 only $2,935,000 came from the United Kingdom. Other countries gained these reductions without compensation. Scores of other items could be listed with similar results.

In the agreement with France a reduction of 20 percent was made on crude glycerine. In 1937 our total imports were 10,171,000 pounds, while from France we imported only 2,102,000 pounds, or about 21 percent of the total. In the same agreement a reduction of 22 percent was made on opera and field glasses valued at less than $1 each. Out of a total importation of 1,521,000, only 81,000, with a value of $13,000, came from France, while 1,436,000, with a value of $126,000, came from Japan.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course, the Senator is familiar with the fact that every one of the reciprocal-trade agreements contains an escape clause, providing that the United States may abrogate any portion of the agreement when it appears, first, that some other country than the country entering into the agreement with the United States has profited to a greater extent than has the contracting party; and, second, that the domestic industry has suffered as a result of it. Apparently, in most of the cases which the Senator has cited, particularly the last one, it is perfectly apparent that the domestic industry has not been able to make out a case, or has not tried to make out a case, showing that it has suffered any injury, because such a situation would be a classic example for the application of the escape-clause provision in any of the treaties.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that the escape clause has escaped the notice of those in control of the administration of the law. Probably that is the only function it performs, because up to date nothing has been done under the so-called escape clause.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Can the Senator tell us whether or not any showing has been made that the domestic industry suffered from that agreement?

Mr. McCARRAN. I can answer that question only from personal experience. I do not mean to be captious in making this reply to the Senator, but my own experience is—and I had the privilege of observing other Members of the Senate have the same experience—that those who went down to the State Department and made a protest were looked upon as though they were wooden Indians, and not a single result came out of any of the protests.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not talking about making a protest. I am talking about making a showing of what actually transpired. If the Senator will permit a very brief illustration of what I am talking about, in one case in which an industry contended that the reduction of the duty in the Canadian agreement had resulted in greater benefit to Mexico and Chile than to Canada, the import figures undoubtedly sustained that position; but when I investigated the question of whether or not the domestic industry had suffered an injury I discovered that the increase of domestic production—production in the United States itself—was vastly in excess of all the imports under that provision, and that the price of the commodity in this country was better, to a very material extent, than it was when the Canadian trade agreement went into effect. Without being familiar with all the items the Senator has read, it seems to me entirely possible that similar situations might exist with respect to them.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in a rather homely way I wish to reply to the Senator from a circular which came into my hands this morning, which strikes me very forcibly. This circular is over the signature of Mr. George C. Salsberry, of the Trades and Labor Council, and has to do especially with one commodity. I read only a portion of the circular:

Our city is the center of the American pottery industry. Our industry, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, is organized 95 percent. We have a capacity to produce all the tableware needed for the American market. We have thousands of idle pottery workers seeking work. Yet, for illustration, while our American laws prohibit the entry of Asiatic workers into this country, the products of such workers, according to a survey made and published by the United States Tariff Commission supply some 40 percent of the tableware yearly sold in the United States. Such a condition naturally transfers the badly needed job opportunities of American workers to the slave wage paid workers of Japan. That which is true of our condition is likewise, no doubt, true in many other industries.

I quote that excerpt from the circular because it is undoubtedly true. We entered into no trade treaty with Japan, but Japan not only has taken advantage of overcoming our normal tariffs, which were enacted by the tariff law of 1930, but when we lower the bars on any commodity produced in Japan, she takes advantage of it under the most-favored-nation clause, and sends goods to the United States on which she realizes a double profit by reason of the slave labor which produces those commodities. So today, as illustrated by this circular, an excerpt from which I have read, thousands of toilers of America are out of employment, while Japan is furnishing 50 percent of the tableware for the tables of America.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. While the Senator is discussing conditions in Japan, let me say that I know from the hearings before the Finance Committee that in some lines of industry in Japan wages are 4 cents an hour, whereas in this country they are 50, 55, or 60 cents an hour.

Mr. McCARRAN. What the Senator says in that respect is true. I might go a little further in connection with something with which I am perhaps more familiar. I mentioned it on the floor of the Senate the other day. Today copper is produced in Rhodesia at wages not to exceed 30 cents a day—slave wages paid to the poor unfortunate creatures who live in Africa. The American miner today receives a sliding scale of wages based upon the price of copper, ranging all the way from $5 as a minimum to $6.60.

To show what we are doing when we tear down the bars, if we enter into an agreement with Chile on copper—which was proposed last fall, and which seemed to have been set aside by reason of protests—Rhodesian copper will come into this country by way of ballast and otherwise. Furthermore, if we enter into an agreement with Chile on copper, we shall bring into this country copper produced at wages not to exceed 58 cents a day—not an hour but a day. If we open the gates, we shall have to double the appropriation we must make in a week or so. We expect to appropriate about one and a half billion dollars to take care of the unemployed in America. If we tear down our protection for the wage earners of America, very soon we shall have to appropriate, not one and a half billions but two billions or three billions of dollars to take care of the unemployed, while we give employment abroad to those who work under slave conditions.

Mr. DAVIS. If the wages of the workers of the rest of the world were equal to the wages we pay in this country, there would not be any question about our ability to compete with other nations; but so long as there is such a great difference we cannot expect the farmer and industry in America to be prosperous when this country is flooded with imports.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator might add further that even the depressed wage standards which now obtain in Europe are still further threatened by present conditions. I invite the Senator's attention—if he has failed to notice it—to the testimony before the Senate Finance Committee of Mr. Matthew Woll, speaking for America's Wage Earners' Protective Conference, in which Mr. Woll quotes Mr. Daniel J. Tobin, vice president of the American Federation of Labor. I quote, if the Senator will permit me:

> Daniel J. Tobin, vice president of the American Federation of Labor, president of Teamsters' International Union, and chairman of Democratic Labor Committee in 1932 and 1936, a keen student of world and labor conditions, in a leading editorial in the Teamsters' February Journal, says, in part:
> "The labor movement is destroyed in most of the countries of the world. That includes the Americas north and south of the United States. If the war conditions continue for 2 years from now, what is left of the labor movement in the European countries will be destroyed because of the economic destruction due to war. * * * Only those who close their eyes or through their ignorance or blindness to war conditions can fail to see that with the destruction of value in the European countries, no matter who wins the war, the economic conditions of those countries will be destroyed. * * * The markets of the world will be drawn down and cheap labor will be forced upon all the workers of the European countries so that they can help pay the expenses of this awful catastrophe now obtaining in Europe and Asia."

In other words, not only is there already a stupendous differential between foreign and domestic costs of production, but a multiplied differential is rapidly approaching, and unless we protect ourselves in some such fashion—and certainly the Senator's proposal is a very modest protection—we shall be completely at the mercy of the economic jeopardy which has the rest of the world by the throat.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I am very grateful to the Senator from Michigan for his contribution.

Let me continue with the subject by saying that we have no agreement with either Denmark or Italy on certain commodities. But in the French agreement we reduced the duty on blue mold cheese from 7 cents to 5 cents a pound, or nearly 30 percent. Yet in 1937 we imported only 281,000 pounds from France compared with 2,220,000 from Denmark and 809,000 pounds from Italy. We have no agreement with either Denmark or Italy. On red-clover seed we made a reduction of 37½ percent. Only 16 percent of our imports came from France. Greater imports came from Hungary, Poland, and Canada. Many other items in the French agreement with similar results could be cited.

In the Belgian agreement we reduced the duty on laminated glass 25 percent. Of total imports of $604,000 in 1937, only $33,000 came from Belgium. This was only a little over 5 percent of the total. Most of the remainder came from Canada. In the case of plate glass not over 384 square inches, imports from Belgium in 1937 were valued at $5,532 of a total of $311,000. Canada again obtained a free concession, since over 95 percent came from that country. A reduction of 50 percent was made in the duty on motion-picture films, positive, 1 inch or more in width. From Belgium, to whom the concession was given, our 1937 imports were less than 1 percent of the total of $1,168,000. About 99 percent came from Canada. Many additional similar examples could be given.

In the Swedish agreement we reduced the rate on chromium metal, but of $91,000 imports in 1937, not one dollar's worth came from Sweden. Norway and the United Kingdom were favored. A similar result was obtained in the case of ball bearings and rollers. Although the duty was reduced in the Swedish agreement, no imports of these articles came from that country in 1937, although total imports were $53,000.

In the agreement with the Netherlands the duty on edible gelatin was reduced nearly 50 percent. Of total imports of $1,142,000 in 1937, only $234,000 came from the Netherlands. Belgium and France were the chief beneficiaries, but they were under no obligation to grant us anything in return. Sweetened chocolate valued at 10 cents or more a pound was reduced 50 percent, but of 472,000 pounds imported in 1937, only 74,000 pounds came from the Netherlands. A dozen European countries benefited from this reduction. We reduced the duty on gin by 50 percent, but in 1937 only 13 percent of the imports came from the Netherlands. The United Kingdom supplied about 85 percent of the total imports of $220,000. In the same agreement we reduced the duty on harvest hats of palm leaf. Of total imports of $83,000 in 1937, over 90 percent, or $78,000, came from Mexico, a country with which we had no reciprocal-trade agreement whatever.

In the Swiss agreement we reduced the duty on woven silk fabrics 30 percent. Of $324,000 imports in 1937 only 15 percent came from Switzerland. Twice as much came from Italy and France, and the United Kingdom participated in the benefits. The duty on braids, plaits, and so forth, of straw, chip, and so forth, was reduced up to 50 percent in the same agreement, but of total 1937 imports of $483,000, only $686 came from Switzerland. This was less than 1 percent, while over 95 percent came from Japan. At the same time the duty on handkerchiefs other than cotton was reduced between 25 percent and 50 percent. Of total imports of $1,453,000, over 90 percent came from China in 1937, and the latter country obtained the benefits without entering into reciprocal obligations, for China is not a party to any trade agreement with this country.

Numerous additional items could be listed not only in the agreements here covered but in other agreements.

The upshot is that a revealing light is thrown on the "extreme care and caution" exercised by our trade-agreement negotiators in selecting items for duty reductions. The results give the appearance of general duty reductions rather than of reciprocity.

Mr. President, what I wish to illustrate to the Senate and to the country is that, while we enter into these trade agreements and while our officials having to do with these agreements may have in mind the protection of American labor between this country and the country with which the agreement is entered into, the moment the agreement is consummated, then the most-favored-nation clause comes into operation in other countries in which labor conditions are entirely different and they take advantage of the situation.

Mr. President, if there is anything that should be of concern to the Congress today, it is the welfare of the toiler; if there is anything that should be of concern to the American public today, it is the welfare of our laboring class, because today there is vast unemployment in the United States. We are told in one estimate, made by Miss Dorothy Thompson some time ago, although I think she is 50 percent wrong, that the unemployed in this country number about 4,000,000. The American Federation of Labor estimates the unemployed, that is, the unemployed capable and willing to go to work, at about 10,000,000. The C. I. O. estimates the unemployed at about 11,000,000. Federal estimates, unpublished, fix the number of unemployed at about 9,000,000. So today, after nearly 8 years of an administration in which we have participated with our whole soul, if you please, we find ourselves confronted with anywhere from 4,000,000 to 10,000,000 unemployed in America. Yet we are now about to write a tariff bill which will permit those sitting down here in the State Department, who never had the opportunity of facing public approbation or disapprobation, to tear down the protection which is afforded the American toiler and which enables him to work for American wages.

If there is anything in the world, I say, in which the Congress of the United States should be interested, it is, first of all, to reduce the number of unemployed in this country, to reduce it by maintaining American standards of living, so that the American toiler may look the world in the face and say, "Thank God, I am an American citizen."

However, the question under consideration goes even further than that. As referred to by the able Senator from Michigan a moment ago, we shall be confronted with a condition that may come soon or may be deferred, namely, the cessation of hostilities abroad. When that time comes, the people, the toilers, and the industrialists in far-off lands will be looking to America for a precept and example. If this country, with 135,000,000 human beings, living under a constitutional democratic form of government, cannot maintain the standards of living that belong here for its laborers and toilers, then in what condition will we be to lead civilization in the centuries to come? That is our heritage. Mr. President, just so surely as you and I are here, if America has a destiny at all, as it has far beyond the imagination of those who framed this Government, it is that when the holocaust of hell abroad shall have ended, when men shall be looking again to the ways of peace, they will be seeking for leadership; and if you and I love our Government as we should, we should maintain such a position, maintain such a standard of living, and promote such happiness in the hearts of our toilers that other countries looking for leadership, looking for the way out of the dismal condition in which they find themselves, will behold as a beacon light your flag and mine, Mr. President, your country and mine, because within our country there will have been nurtured and preserved opportunities for the toilers. If we tear down that which protects our toilers, if we permit to exist conditions which cause thousands upon thousands of pottery workers and other workers to seek jobs at $55 a month on W. P. A. projects, then we shall have been neglectful of our duty.

So, Mr. President, I offer this amendment with the hope, with the prayer, with the fervent wish that at the close of this 2 weeks' debate the Senate may see fit to write into the joint resolution a mandate and a message to the world that this country, above all countries in the world, stands for the welfare of the worker, to the end that industry may have security under the laws of our land.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, when I was speaking to the Senate last week upon the reciprocal-trade treaties, I presented some calculations from the National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation which I thought were very impressive. In the same connection, the able Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] promptly presented a memorandum prepared at the State Department challenging the figures of the National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation, and the deductions from them.

I now have a further statement from the Federation which is addressed to the Senate, and which carries with it their final calculations. I ask that their statement and their tables be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement and tables are as follows:

THE NATIONAL COOPERATIVE MILK PRODUCERS' FEDERATION,
Washington, D. C., March 30, 1940.

To Members of the United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: I am enclosing for your consideration 17 statistical tables which represent a further stage in our research project relating to the economic advantages and disadvantages of the United States trade-agreement program.

May I first especially call to your attention tables VII to XII, inclusive. The data contained in these tables have a bearing upon the value of the amendment offered by Senator PAT MCCARRAN, of Nevada. His amendment is designed to exclude from importation the products of workers, farmers, or miners of foreign countries at total landed costs, all tariff duties paid, when such total costs are less than the cost of production or wholesale selling prices of competitive products of American workers, farmers, or miners where such American products are commercially available.

Our organization supports the McCarran amendment and we respectfully commend to your earnest consideration these particular tables in view of the amendment which is still pending before the Senate body.

The results of our preliminary study formed the basis for my testimony before the Senate Finance Committee during the progress of hearings on House Joint Resolution 407. At that time I stated to the committee that our conclusions were tentative and that we would proceed with the study. I am gratified to report in this letter that we have progressed to a point of completion with results reflecting substantially the same picture as that previously characterized to the Senate Finance Committee.

In this connection it is apropos to refer to the memorandum of the United States Tariff Commission relating to our studies which was inserted into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD during the course of the debate in the Senate on the pending resolution to extend the Trade Agreements Act.This appears at pages 3502–3503, March 27 issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

In the Commission's memorandum no apparent effort was made to break down the data contained in our preliminary tables nor to erect a series of comparable tables which would express the Commission's view of the statistics compiled by us. No counter-study is made available to reflect a picture of the trade-agreement program different from that indicated by the statistics presented by me to the committee. With this inadequate approach to our study, the Commission is hardly justified in challenging our results.

In the Commission's memorandum benefits are claimed from "enlarged quotas, liberalized exchange treatment, etc." We considered this question and came to what we believed to be the common-sense conclusion that the amount of a quota concession is but a little enlargement in the trade result unless the trade in the commodity reflects the so-called concession. So we have limited our study to actual trade in which the tariff or internal tax positions were affected.

The Commission alleges that the United States has obtained benefits from other nations by virtue of the so-called reciprocal most-favored-nation treatment. The Commission states that there are several hundred trade treaties relating to tariffs entered into by foreign governments from which the United States has benefited. The Commission, however, offers no evidence in its memorandum to sustain this allegation.

The Commission in its memorandum alleges that "the value shown for imports of industrial products in table 2, in fact, include all the noncompetitive agricultural imports, such as raw silk, rubber, coffee, tea, raw wool for carpets, and cacao beans." That statement is not true. Only one commodity, rubber, was reclassified by us as an industrial commodity whereas the governmental classification places it as a noncompetitive agricultural product. We are unable to see any justification for classifying rubber as an agricultural commodity since, insofar as our knowledge goes, its uses are entirely industrial and no competitive product is produced by American farmers. At any rate, as I pointed out to the committee, the rubber-classification problem is of little consequence because if one subtracts from our table of industrial imports the rubber imports, the picture will not be changed materially. Rubber imports will then be shifted to the agricultural tables and the result will simply be to increase the import balance of agricultural products as compared with the export balance of such products

Likewise, the Commission raises a question as to our classification of the banana as a competitive agricultural product. With respect to this item we exercise our independent judgment and will defend it that bananas are competitive with agricultural products of the United States, namely, the cereals. Many nutrition authorities highly recommend the banana as a substitute for the breakfast cereals and bread.

Mention is made of our use of the terms "competitive" and "noncompetitive." We are fully aware of the fact that the Department of Agriculture chooses to substitute for these the terms "supplementary" and "complementary." However, our use of the words "competitive" and "noncompetitive" in connection with our statistical tables was intended only for the purposes of making the tables more understandable to the layman. I mention this only in passing and for the reason that the Commission directs its criticism of the study to details of this nature rather than to any points of substance.

In this regard it is well to recall my testimony before the Senate Finance Committee (p. 681 of the record of hearings) wherein I stated that the method of study employed by us "is open to anyone who wishes to examine it." Mr. Manuel A. Fox, a member of the Tariff Commission, was personally invited by me to check our basic material immediately following the close of the hearings. Neither he nor anyone else took advantage of this opportunity.

Another matter to which I wish to direct your attention in the revised tables is the fact that figures pertaining to import and export items of trade-agreement colonies have been placed in their proper place with trade-agreement countries. At the time I testified before the committee we had not had time to do this but rather had included the colonies in figures for non-trade-agreement countries. Even so, this adjustment does not materially change the total picture.

In making our statistical study we have been placed at considerable disadvantage by reason of the inadequacy of many governmental reports. In some instances we were compelled, on the recommendation of officials, to resort to foreign statistics because of no comparable domestic study of import-export figures. In others we were forced to use photostatic copies of worksheets because of the unavailability of Government-published figures. Notwithstanding this, I sincerely believe that the revised data submitted herewith gives a fairly representative picture of the effect of the trade-agreement program.

Sincerely yours,

CHAS. W. HOLMAN, Secretary.

A STATISTICAL APPRAISAL OF THE UNITED STATES TRADE-AGREEMENT PROGRAM

The following is an explanation of the method used in compiling the data from which tables I to XII, inclusive, of this study were built: In appraising the respective advantages and disadvantages to the United States from the operation of the trade-agreement policy under the terms of the Trade Agreement Act of 1934, we have used only those articles on which (1) duties were reduced, (2) duties or internal taxes were bound, and (3) articles were bound on the free list. We have not attempted to measure the theoretical effect of concessions such as quotas, because a quota in itself means nothing except a limitation on quantities of products which might be imported into a country. The essential thing is the amount of trade on articles wherein the actual duties or internal taxes were affected.

With regard to classification of items, a very difficult matter, the tariff item numbers were taken from the text of the respective trade agreements. Import classifications were based on "Statistical classification of imports into the United States" effective January 1, 1939.

After consultation with various governmental authorities, the following sources were used:

(1) Canadian exports were taken from the Canadian Year Book;

(2) Belgium, Brazil, Colombia, Finland, France, Guatemala, Netherlands, Sweden, Switzerland, Venezuela, and Cuba exports were taken from foreign-country statistics furnished by the United States Department of Commerce;

(3) All other exports were taken from "Foreign commerce and navigation of the United States," by the United States Department of Commerce, because the statistics from foreign sources were not available;

(4) Imports were based exclusively on those given in "Foreign commerce and navigation of the United States" by the United States Department of Commerce.

We have found no method of appraising any theoretical advantages to our Nation by virtue of the inclusion of the most-favored-nation clause in trade agreements. We have found no reports of the Government giving any information of value on this question. On the other hand, because of the generalization power in the Trade Agreements Act, we have included in these tables the imports from all other countries of the affected commodities with the exception of Germany, because such countries obtain the benefit of our concessions to the trade-agreement countries without themselves having to give us any concessions.

With regard to another phase of classification of commodities, we have classified rubber as an industrial product and the banana as a competitive agricultural product. Contrary to the statement of the Tariff Commission (p. 3502 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 27, 1940), the rubber and the banana were the only two commodities in which we changed the classification used by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, although, in order that laymen can understand what they are reading, we have used the terms "competitive" and "noncompetitive" instead of the terms "supplementary" and "complementary." So far as our knowledge goes, rubber is an industrial product and is not competitive with any agricultural products grown in the United States. On the other hand, the banana is directly competitive with cereal products, particularly those used on the breakfast table. We do not accept the classification of the Department of Agriculture with respect to rubber and bananas. This, however, is not the first time that our organization has challenged governmental classifications. We note in this connection that the competitive classifications used by us for many years with respect to oils and fats have gradually been accepted by the Federal Government as correct.

Attention is called to the fact that these revised tables agree in general with the results of the first survey made public in my testimony of March 5, 1940, before the Senate Finance Committee in connection with the proposal to extend for another 3 years the operation of the Trade Agreements Act. But, as I pointed out to the committee, those tables were not complete as to structure and needed revisions. The accompanying tables represent the second preliminary phase of our study and substantiate the general points made in my testimony. The principal reasons for changes in totals occur from the fact that at the time of my testimony we had not been able to classify properly some 70 articles, and these articles were omitted from the study. Also, we had not had the time properly to incorporate into the trade-agreement picture the relationship of our trade with the colonies of the three countries with which we have effective trade agreements involving colonial possessions.

Attached tables I to VI, inclusive, represent a revision of the information given to the Senate Finance Committee. Tables VII to XII, inclusive, represent new phases of this study which we believe to be of particular interest in view of the great issues involved in this controversy. Tables XIII to XVII, inclusive, have not been changed.

With respect to tables VII to XII, inclusive, attention is called to the fact that, although trade agreements with the United Kingdom, Turkey, Venezuela, and the second agreement with Canada were not effective in the year 1938, it may be assumed that the trade of the United States would not have been sufficiently different in the year 1939 to change in substantial measure the conclusions expressed in these tables.

In this study the items showing benefits obtained by non-trade-agreement countries through our policy of generalization also include the benefits obtained by the trade-agreement countries because of the same policy.

Although the computed average ad valorem duty paid on industrial items for non-trade-agreement countries (table VIII) was found to be only 23 percent, the time element was too short to permit rechecking this item. However, the ad varolem rate for all dutiable items included in the agreements and for all countries (including Cuba) except Germany was found to be 32.8 percent. This compares reasonably well with the 35 percent found by the Tariff Commission, since their study was based on 1937 rather than 1938 and included some items for Germany and free items on which an excise tax was paid, both of which were omitted from our study. Moreover, our study included items which were found in the Venezuelan agreement, while these items were omitted from the Tariff Commission study.

With special reference to tables VII, VIII, and IX, the computed landed costs of imports include (1) the foreign valuation, (2) duties paid, and (3) an estimate of 15 percent to cover such items of additional cost as packing, ocean freight rates, insurance, port charges, handling charges, and so forth.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, 2 days ago, while I was discussing an amendment, I stated that at some opportune time I desired to discuss the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. I seize this opportunity to discuss the act and to state my reason in opposition to its continuance.

Mr. President, the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was passed in 1934 as an emergency measure; it was extended in 1937 as an emergency measure; and it is before Congress today as an emergency measure. Just what emergencies presumably necessitated this legislation? The argument made in former years that the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was the product of emergencies was presented upon the theory that this act and its continuance would restore normal economic conditions. It did not happen here as proposed. Now, the able Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] in charge of the joint resolution argues that "we are still trying to meet that emergency" because of the conflict in other hemispheres. In my opinion, there is a real emergency, but it runs in reverse to the fantastic emergencies advanced by this administration.

With nations torn and tottering, with issue of victory or defeat in the balance, with the eventuality of peace in the future, with millions of veterans in these countries returning to the fold of employment, with currencies debased and depreciated and standards of living sagging far below our own, this country must be free to meet these unhappy conditions without the embarrassment of a continuing trade-agreements statute and understandings that may be based thereon.

The deplorable and destructive policy behind the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act involves increasing imports of competitive articles into the United States in order to increase exports. That program means reductions in the protection given many domestic products. This is true of both agricultural and industrial products competitive with similar articles which seek entrance into the United States. Such increased competition injures the American producer and curtails production. The injury to the general welfare caused by the imports is incalculably greater than the gains due to the exports.

Promoters of foreign trade argue that our domestic prosperity depends upon foreign trade. It is their claim that prosperity or depression is a matter of much or little foreign trade, and they offer as proof the large foreign-trade figures of 1929 and the small foreign-trade figures of 1932.

Mr. President, inevitably foreign trade fluctuates with the prosperity of domestic trade. Raw materials and other commodities not produced in our country are imported in greater volume when business is active. In prosperous times more luxuries are imported. Our exports are affected by similar conditions abroad. The large export figures for 1929 reflect some of the loans we made abroad to finance such purchases. The figures of both exports and imports for 1929 reflect inflated prices, like 17-cent cotton; and the figures for 1932 reflect depressed prices, abnormally depressed by a 30-percent depreciation in foreign currencies, like 6-cent cotton.

However, there is a unanimous agreement that the farmers who produce crops in excess of domestic requirements must have export markets to be prosperous under present conditions. The surpluses of such important commodities as wheat, cotton, tobacco, meat products, and certain fruit and vegetable crops must be sold abroad if the farmer is to receive a fair price for his total crop. Proponents of the reciprocal-agreements program claim that they have reopened many markets for our agricultural surpluses. What are the facts?

The first thing that is noted when trade statistics are examined is the increase in exports of all commodities since 1932. Thus, total exports from the fiscal year 1932 to the fiscal year 1939 have increased from $1,908,000,000 to $2,885,000,000, or by 51.2 percent. Agricultural exports, on the other hand, have actually declined over the same period from $752,000,000 to $683,000,000 or by 9.2 percent. In fact, agricultural exports as a percentage of total exports reached a low of 23.7 percent in the fiscal year 1939, the lowest for any fiscal year for which records are available.

To give only the total figures, however, does not give the whole picture. In order better to understand the real effect of the reciprocal-trade program on agriculture, it is necessary to examine two of the specific commodities which annually bulk largest in our agricultural export trade.

Proponents of the agreements program have been unanimous in their praise of the concessions we received on wheat and wheat flour. They point with pride to the increase of over 600 percent in the quantity exported to all countries from 1935 to 1938. What they neglect to point out, however, is that exports to concession countries with which we have trade agreements increased but 350 percent, while over the same period exports to nonconcession countries increased nearly 800 percent, or twice as much, relatively, as exports to concession countries. Nor do they mention that in 1938 and 1939 we subsidized the export of millions of bushels of wheat, either in the form of grain or flour, and that a large percentage of the subsidized exports went to countries which granted us concessions through trade agreements.

The case of cotton offers further illumination on the agreements program. The trade agreements have had no direct effect on cotton, as it enters all the important world markets duty free. Cotton does offer, however, an excellent test of the theory, often advanced, that trade in all commodities would increase whether the subject of concessions or not. If there were any validity to this theory, certainly exports of cotton, in which in the past we held a dominant world position, should be the first to feel the upsurge. From 1935 through 1938, however, the amount of American cotton entering foreign markets has declined 22 percent, while over the same period foreign mill consumption has increased 10 percent. Even more significant is the fact that cotton exports as a percentage of previous years' production have dropped from 44.9 percent in 1929 to 28.1 percent in 1938. Has the cotton grower benefited from the trade-agreements program?

Mr. President, these are just two examples of commodities which have shown increases in exports to all countries, but have shown either declines or much smaller increases in exports to countries which gave us concessions in reciprocal-trade agreements.

That such a situation should exist, however, is wholly illogical. When foreign countries reduce the duty on a given commodity, the market for that commodity should be made more accessible to American exports. Why, then, has not this happened in the case of the two commodities to which reference has been made? The answer hinges on two factors either unknown to or purposely ignored by the administration. The first of these is the comparative unimportance of tariff barriers in many countries today. In recent years, new and heretofore unknown barriers to trade have sprung up—barriers which are much more effective than the tariff in limiting imports. Such things as quotas, clearing agreements, exchange restrictions, exchange subsidies, import licenses, and many other artificial restraints to trade have grown like wicked weeds.

As I stated a few days ago on the floor of the Senate, and I do not particularly desire to repeat at this time, the discrepancies in the depreciation of foreign currencies have wholly demolished any protection we had under the Smoot-Hawley Act in the case of nearly all the imports which are coming into this country.

Not only are agricultural exports less today than in the fiscal year 1932, but they have increased only 2.1 percent since 1935, while nonagricultural exports were increasing 55.5 percent. In addition, the program has failed to solve the pressing problems imposed by our surpluses of wheat and cotton and other farm products.

Mr. President, the effect of the agreements program on the farmer does not stop with exports. Not only are concessions, in the form of duty reductions, granted graciously and generously, but in return our own duties are reduced drastically for the sake of the foreign producers. The American farmer did not anticipate such reductions, for in 1932 President Roosevelt stated in a fervent speech, delivered in Baltimore on October 25, when he was a candidate for the office he now occupies, that:

> * * * It is absurd to talk of lowering tariff duties on farm products. * * * I know of no effective excessively high tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered. To do so would be inconsistent with my entire farm program, and every farmer in the United States knows it and will not be deceived.

Mr. President, consistent with most administration campaign promises, this, too, was broken. Up to and including the British and revised Canadian agreements, duties were lowered on about 1,100 commodities. Of these concessions, all but 18, those granted to Cuba, were generalized to all the countries of the world, except Germany, under the most-favored-nation policy, which policy was also the product of a Democratic administration, some 22 years ago.

Secretary Hull claims that the nature of the concessions granted is such that the farmer need not worry. He points out that two-thirds of our agricultural imports are noncompetitive, consisting of such things as rubber, coffee, tea, bananas, silk, and so forth. The Secretary stated in an address in Chicago on December 5, 1939:

> The products comprised in the remaining third * * * are predominantly of the two types: First, commodities of which we do not produce enough for our domestic requirements * * *; and second, products * * * which we import because of special quality or use, or differences in marketing season, or other special considerations.

One might well ask into which of these categories do reductions on such products as cattle, milk, cream, various cheeses, hay, oats, rye, potatoes, live poultry, eggs, apples, cherries, other fruits, and vegetables fall? We certainly produce a surplus of these commodities. Must we assume, therefore, that these reductions were made without the knowledge of the Secretary or the assent of the President?

Further examination of the specific commodities reveals that while the State Department is reducing our duties on agricultural commodities the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation is making large purchases of the same commodities. From July 1, 1937, through June 30, 1939, the Corporation spent $30,479,000 on surplus removal operations as to 20 commodities which were the subject of concessions in the various agreements. During the same period imports of these commodities were valued at $92,298,000.

When faced with the fact of duty reductions on many highly competitive products, the chief argument used by proponents of the trade-agreements program is to cite how much better off the farmer is today than he was in 1932. Thus, Secretary Hull, in a recent speech before the American Farm Bureau Federation, stated:

> By 1932, after 2½ years of Hawley-Smoot tariff embargoes, farm income had fallen to four and six-tenths billion dollars. By 1938, after 4 years of trade-agreement policy, it had risen to seven and five-tenths billions, excluding benefit payments. Were farmers hurt by this three billion increase in farm income?

To determine the role played by the trade-agreements program in this increase, it is necessary to examine the record a little more closely. To again quote Secretary Hull, "after 2½ years of Hawley-Smoot tariff embargoes," farm income had fallen a trifle less than $5,000,000,000. The Secretary neglected to point out, however, that after 3 more years, from 1933 to 1935, inclusive, of what he characterizes as tariff embargoes, farm income had risen to practically $7,000,000,000, an increase of $2,000,000,000, or 47.7 percent.

Under the reciprocal trade agreements program, farm income in 1938 had risen to seven and five-tenths billion dollars, an increase of but one-half a billion dollars over 1935, and this increase may be accounted for by payments under the Soil Conservation Act, grants by virtue of section 32 of the A. A. A., and subsidies in many forms.

Mr. President, one of the outstanding defects in the administration of the trade-agreements program has been that the benefits granted by the United States to countries with which trade agreements have been negotiated have been generalized to countries which flagrantly discriminate against our exports. The Trade Agreements Act provides that the President may suspend such generalization to any country because it discriminates against our exports or because it adopts other policies tending to defeat the purposes of the act. But only on one occasion has the United States taken the initiative in exercising this authority.

The growth of new and artificial barriers to world trade was one of the compelling factors in the tremendous decline in world trade from 1929 to 1932, and it was one of the major objectives of the Trade Agreements Act to reduce these barriers. The use of these barriers was prompted by a desire for national self-sufficiency and an effort to protect the domestic economy of many countries from the impact of ruinous world prices for their export commodities. This led to a system of bilateral balancing of trade which was forced on some countries by their weak financial position, and was used by others as a disguise for extreme protectionism. The most prevalent barriers are exchange controls, quotas, clearing agreements, barter agreements, compensation agreements, payment agreements, and import licenses.

There are two kinds of foreign trade: The one, natural exchange of noncompetitive products between two nations, resulting in mutual gain and satisfaction, which is the policy that President McKinley had in mind when he made his famous speech in Buffalo; the other, trade in competitive commodities which both nations are able and eager to produce themselves. This is the kind of trade about which nations fight. This situation must be avoided. This situation will be avoided by our refusal to extend the life of the reciprocal-trade agreements.

In recent years our foreign trade has accounted for about 5 percent of the national income. It is estimated that our exports and imports are divided between the above two classifications, so that about 2½ percent of our national income is derived from foreign trade in competitive articles. But let us stop, look, and listen at the damage the small percentage of competitive imports can do.

Mr. President, at this juncture permit me to summon the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], an unimpeachable witness, who said in an admirable radio address on January 7, and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 8, 1940:

> You cannot beat the law of supply and demand in an open market. If you increase the supply in an open market, such as we have inside the United States for farm products, you lower the price.
> So it is inescapable, as I see it, that when you increase imports of farm products into a domestic market already oversupplied, you drive the price still further below parity, and this while the Federal Treasury is pouring out billions of dollars in the attempt to bring parity prices to the American farmer.
> My friends, these two programs, the Triple A and the reciprocal-trade agreements, just do not make sense. Try to reconcile them and see where you get.
> Now I know that supporters of trade agreements will produce figures and statistics galore to show that the additional imports of wheat or beef or dairy products, etc. are such a small percentage of domestic consumption that the effect is imperceptible.
> But the effect is not imperceptible. It is immediate and very noticeable.
> The reason is simple.
> In an open market the lowest offer sets the price.
> We have an open market on farm commodities inside the United States.

Mr. President, everyone knows that if a surplus of an article is produced, and that surplus is added to, it causes depression of the price levels, and the farmer then sees a zero market for his articles.

Our foreign trade in noncompetitive articles should, of course, be encouraged and developed to the utmost. That is the kind of foreign trade to promote by reciprocal-trade agreements. But foreign trade involving imports of competitive articles is profoundly injurious to our national welfare, and it is such injury that tariffs and other protective measures seek to prevent. In the first place, there is no net gain. Competitive imports displace the production of the same articles which would have been produced in the United States. That means unemployment for American labor somewhere. Furthermore, when foreign price competition becomes acute for any reason, the price levels for the entire output of the domestic industries affected are lowered to meet the lower foreign prices, resulting in prices below the cost of production on the higher American standard of wages, although the imports may represent only a small percentage of the domestic consumption. That is the way price competition works, especially during periods of business depression, and it explains why such great damage can be done to our industries by a relatively small amount of competitive imports. Normal and healthy growth of our industries is also prevented thereby.

Of two choices, which is the soundest economic policy for the United States?

First. Should we seek to increase our exports, which represent only 5 percent of our total trade, by inviting imports of foreign competitive products at the expense of the prosperity and expansion of our domestic trade, which represents 95 percent of our total trade? It is true, as promoters of export trade argue, that we must buy if we are to sell. That is all right for the amount of noncompetitive imports which our economy demands, but where is the gain in respect to competitive imports?

Second. Or should we promote the prosperity and expansion of our domestic trade by protecting it from injury resulting from the sale of foreign competitive imports at prices below the American cost of production?

The Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act of 1930 has been set up as a political straw man at which to throw rocks and blame for much of the Nation's economic trouble since that date. As a matter of fact, it is undoubtedly true that the higher tariffs provided by that act served to protect American industry during 1931, 1932, and early 1933, during the extreme depreciation of foreign currencies which, in large measure, nullified existing tariffs. It has been too little appreciated that the extreme deflation and economic depression during that period was due not to the Hawley-Smoot Act but to the depreciation of foreign currencies which, in effect, abrogated the provisions of the Hawley-Smoot Act. Had the act not been in existence at that time the depression would have been even worse than that which we encountered, since foreign competition in our domestic markets would have been more intensified.

The action taken by other nations to control exchange and set up trade barriers at this time was not due to retaliation against the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act, as it is often proclaimed. The competitive conditions that caused the depreciated currency contest, the struggle among other nations to retain gold in balancing their international trade by increasing exports and restraining imports, were the true reasons for the rapid growth of international-trade restrictions. As a matter of fact, we suffered greatly during this period because of failure to act in self-defense.

Thus, analysis shows that the much-abused Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act had nothing to do with the depression of 1932, except as it served to soften the effect on us of foreign competition due to currency depreciation. The true villain was depreciated foreign currencies. Likewise, the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act has had little to do with the recovery since 1932, except that it has served to intensify foreign competition in our domestic markets. Over the years, we have suffered from too little rather than too much tariff protection.

Mr. President, when this matter was before the House it was discussed most intelligently and eloquently by Representative KNUTSON, of Minnesota, and some remarks he made with regard to the tariffs imposed by the Hawley-Smoot measure and the Fordney-McCumber measure are found on page 1649 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 19, 1940. I ask unanimous consent that the excerpt to which I now refer may be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

For years we were told that the United States was the highest protected country in the world. That statement was false and without the least foundation. In 1928, when the Fordney-McCumber law was in effect, the United States was No. 9 among nations in the ratio of duties to imports with 13.3 percent. The United Kingdom was No. 11 with 10.9 percent.

In 1934, when the Hawley-Smoot law was in effect and before it had been tampered with, we had dropped to eleventh place with the ratio standing at 18.4 percent, whereas the United Kingdom had advanced to sixth place with a ratio of 27 percent. In 1937, the United States was thirteenth with a ratio of 15.6 percent, and the United Kingdom had advanced to fifth place with a ratio of 23 percent.

Now let us see what the picture is as it pertains to imports in relation to population. The customs duties collected per capita in United States dollars in 1937 gives $22.84 to Great Britain as against $3.56 for the United States. These figures knock into a cocked hat all contentions that the Hawley-Smoot Act was excessively high.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, at present, conditions due to the war are affording some insulation from the injurious effects of competitive imports. Increased ocean freight rates and cost of insurance act as a tariff on imports from many foreign sources. Raw materials and food prices, as well as foreign industrial costs, have advanced, as they always do in wartime.

The question asked on all sides is, What will happen if and when the war ends? How are we then to protect ourselves from the deflation of foreign prices translated to us through depreciated foreign currencies manipulated in the struggle for world trade, wherein our large markets may become the dumping ground of foreign countries whose millions will be turned from war- to peace-time production? These are among the thoughts which restrain confidence in the future and retard enterprise.

By far the most important immediate effect of the war thus far is the depreciation of foreign currencies in relation to the American dollar. Thus it will be noted that from November 19, 1938, to February 29, 1940, a little over a year, the British pound declined 17 percent in relation to the dollar; the French franc declined 65.7 percent from May 9, 1936, to February 29, 1940, in relation to the dollar; and the Canadian dollar declined 15 percent from November 19, 1938, to February 29, 1940, to mention only a few examples.

Depreciation of one country's currency in relation to another imposes a heavy burden on the country whose currency remains at the old level. The effect is two-edged. In the first place it raises the price of American goods to foreign buyers in terms of their own money. For example, if wheat produced in the United States was selling for 90 cents a bushel in 1936, it would have cost the French importer approximately 15 francs. Today, however, to obtain wheat selling for the same price in the United States the French importer must pay approximately 45 francs. Thus, the price of American goods in France has almost trebled in the last 4 years as a result of exchange depreciation.

Nor does the effect of exchange depreciation on our export trade stop here. Not only have currencies depreciated in some of our most important markets, but in addition the currencies of many of our leading competitors for these markets have depreciated. Thus, using the example above, we find that Canada, whose currency has depreciated 13 percent, can ship wheat to France at a cost of but 39 francs to the French importer. This gives Canadian wheat a preference of 6 francs over American wheat in the French market.

The second and most important effect of trading with countries having depreciated currencies is the new ease with which they can sell to us. Using the example of France again, we find that an article priced at 15 francs would have cost the American importer approximately 90 cents in 1936. Today that same article selling for the identical price in France, costs the American importer but 30 cents, a two-thirds decline in the price of French goods in the American markets. Carrying the example further, if the duty on the article was 10 percent ad valorem, the total cost of the article to the American importer, at the time of signing the agreement, would have been 99 cents. Today, this same article, after payment of duty, costs but 33 cents, 57 cents less than it would have cost had the article been duty free 4 years ago. Thus, we are actually subsidizing the importation of goods which we produce.

Mr. President, in my judgment, it is obvious that the trade-agreements program has failed to dissipate, alleviate, or liquidate the uneconomic conditions which existed in 1934, again in 1937, and now in 1940, when the reciprocal trade agreements bill is before the Senate for consideration. The problem of our agricultural surpluses is no less acute today than in 1934. Most of the important world trading countries are progressively discriminating against our trade. Thus, the proposed program of continuing our Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act for 3 years is definitely pregnant with injury to our social and economic welfare, destructive of our country's morale, and militant to our national economic defense.

As a final observation, Mr. President and Members of the Senate, what impelling motive should prompt us to lower our standards to those of Europe and Asia or any other country? Our sacrifice will not solve their problems of economics, conquest, or peace. The best contribution we can make to the world, as well as ourselves, is to defend, preserve, and improve our American standards of living by protecting American markets for American producers at American prices, consistent always with an intelligent policy of reciprocity that does not collide with the resources of any nation with which we contemplate a treaty agreement.

In my opinion, such a policy would assure peace, promote and perpetuate the program of "the good neighbor" which this administration has endeavored to build on a fantastic and futile foundation.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few moments. I wish to register my approval of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], which attempts to state in the measure continuing the Trade Agreements Act a standard to guide the legislation which is to be carried on by virtue of the delegation of power in that act which was passed in 1934. This standard is the total landed costs, including the duty paid, compared with total cost of production here in America.

Mr. President, if that standard could be written into the law at this time, we would overcome the great difficulty which we have had throughout the study of this measure, of evaluating the agreements which have already been made, and the difficulty we are sure to encounter in the future, much increased by the war conditions in the world, of evaluating trade-agreement proposals which may hereafter be made.

I observe that in some instances we have traded off concessions in the nature of mitigations of barriers against a reduction of duty. The question of how these two things, which seem quite impossible to compare should be evaluated, would be simply taken right out of the problem if we laid down a standard so simple and so easy of application as that contained in this amendment, namely, the difference between the total landed cost and the cost of production here.

Mr. President, this is a new rule. We have heretofore used the rule of the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production at home. If we should adopt this new rule, we would escape the mistakes which must certainly arise from exchanging mitigations of barriers for customs duties. We would also escape the evil effects so ably discussed by the Senator from Oregon, the distinguished leader of the minority, when he referred to the fluctuation of exchange as affecting the currencies of the various nations of the world.

I have a very simple but true story to tell of an event that occurred near my home. A merchant there was operating a store which sold, among other things, feed for horses and cattle and poultry. His store was in the town of Richford, Vt., which is on the forty-fifth parallel of latitude, and therefore next-door neighbor to the Dominion of Canada.

One of his best customers, when the difference in exchange between the value of Canadian money and American money was adequate, simply went across the border and bought a carload of grain and paid the tariff on it—not a reduced tariff, not a tariff negotiated to please a country which is friendly to us, and which is vis-a-vis across the negotiating table—but the tariff under the Hawley-Smoot tariff law. He went to this merchant with his bill and said, "Herb, I wish you would figure out how big a check in American money I have to send over there to pay for this carload in Canadian money." The merchant good-naturedly figured it out for him. It turned out that after paying all costs of transportation and the tariff he had made a substantial gain over what the carload of grain would have cost him if he had bought it right in the village where he lived.

That is a very simple illustration of the effect upon our international trade of the fluctuation of money, or the difference in exchange. We must multiply it to a great degree when we take into account the fact that since these trade treaties went into effect fluctuations represented by the following figures have occurred.

Since the trade agreement with France went into effect, the franc has declined 69 percent. Since the trade agreement with the Netherlands went into effect, the guilder has declined 22.6 percent; the Swiss franc has declined 32.1 percent; the Swedish kroner 6.6 percent; the pound 10 percent; the Canadian dollar 8 percent; and the Turkish pound 4.1 percent.

These figures are as of April 2; that is to say, 2 days ago. When we take into account so great a difference between the value of the American dollar and the value of the currencies of the peoples with whom we negotiate these so-called agreements, we must recognize that unless the agreements take into account the very principle stated in the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada, they are of no utility whatever to the manufacturer, to labor, to the producer of agricultural commodities, or to miners in the United States. The question of fluctuating exchange would be completely covered if we should adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Did I correctly understand the Senator to say that in view of the fluctuations in foreign exchange these agreements would be of no effect?

Mr. AUSTIN. Of no effect economically.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Has the Senator anticipated the effect which might result from the fact that the agreements may not be changed, while foreign exchange may fluctuate from day to day?

Mr. AUSTIN. Of course. We are bound for a period of 3 years and 6 months.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In that respect, the effect may be disastrous.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes. The effect is indeed disastrous in respect to tying our hands and disabling us. I thank the Senator for his question, because it brings out an error in my statement. I meant to say that the agreements are not of the effect claimed in support of them.

Mr. President, I wish to emphasize one other point as a reason why we should adopt a standard of the character now proposed. Even if we shall not adopt the pending amendment, we ought to have some standard by which we can evaluate what we give or concede as against what other nations concede to us.

Let us consider the matter of "mitigations of barriers." In a compilation published January 1, 1940, entitled "Concessions Obtained by the United States in Trade Agreements," the United States is shown as having received reductions in duty and "other mitigations of trade barriers" on 14.1 percent of our total export trade. Bindings at existing levels were obtained on an additional 16.2 percent. The 14.1 percent of reductions and mitigations merely refers to the proportion of our exports on which we received reductions and mitigations. It gives no idea of their value to us. We made average cuts in duties of 39 percent; that is, in the trade agreements the United States made an average reduction or concession in tariff rates approximating 39 percent. That is to say, if all our duty reductions are thrown together, it will be found that the average is 39 percent. At the same time, it will be found that of all items upon which a reduction in duty could possibly be made 42 percent, by dollar volume of imports, have been reduced. In other words, nearly half the total ground has been covered. On the remaining items, a number of duties have been bound. These bindings at existing rates affect a dollar volume of imports greater than the volume on which duty reductions were made; but a number of bindings were on items which are, and long have been, on the free list, such as coffee. Thus, we have tied our hands.

What is the value of the concession which we make when we bind on the free list, or bind at existing rates, a number of commodities, and thereby divest the Congress of the right and the duty, as well as the power, to change the customs rates or to change the import restrictions thereon? What I am undertaking to show is the difficulty of evaluating that which we concede for that which we receive. In the item of 14.1 percent, what part of it represents concessions or reductions in the amount of duties, and what part of it represents so-called mitigations? It seems to me it makes a great difference, which might affect our judgment in passing upon this amendment.

I do not think Senators are so bound and tied that they cannot consider a rational ground for establishing a standard if it is presented to them. I feel certain that every Senator, if his judgment were moved by the facts and the consideration of actual experience, would disregard party alinement and vote according to his judgment. Yet we are wholly unable, Mr. President, to ascertain what part of the 14.1 percent represents a reduction of customs duties and what part represents other concessions in the nature of "mitigations."

To show of how little value such concessions may be, particularly in time of war in the world, let me invite attention to the fact that the "mitigations" given to us in consideration of our reductions of customs duties to other nations have consisted largely in liberalized quotas to us. Let me ask, of what good to us is a liberalized quota if a country's money is of so much less value than our own that our prices are correspondingly out of reach for the people of that country? What is the use of increasing or liberalizing the quota of a commodity for which we can obtain little market abroad because of the fluctuation of the exchange, or for other reasons?

It happens that these liberalizations have produced the following results thus far:

If we examine the exports from the United States to the various trade-agreement countries in which foreign-import quotas have been granted us, we find that in the majority of instances we did not fill the quotas, and in an impressive number of instances fell far below the quota allowed.

For example, the Netherlands granted us a quota of 1,000 metric tons of horse meat. In 1937, the year following the agreement, we shipped them only 418 metric tons, or 41 percent of the quota. The same country granted us a quota of 69 metric tons of sheet zinc, whereas we shipped 11 tons in 1937, or 16 percent of the quota. Of a quota of 10,000 pairs of shoes, we shipped 1,347 pairs, or 13 percent of the quota.

Of a quota of 2,762 metric tons of drawn wire, we supplied 865 metric tons, or 31 percent. My, what a wonderful trade that was!

Then consider the agreement with Belgium. Belgium gave us a quota of 2,296,000 pounds of pork. In 1937, after the trade agreement went into effect, we shipped not one pound of pork under the quota.

We received a quota of 22,600 pounds of hides and skins from the same country, and in 1937 shipped 3,740 pounds, or 16 percent of the quota.

Of a quota of 13,200 pounds of hosiery, we supplied 3,000 pounds, or 22 percent of the quota.

Of a quota of 2,200 of collars and cuffs, we supplied none in 1937.

Of a quota of 7,055,000 pounds of natural lard, we shipped 349,000 pounds in 1937, or less than 5 percent. That was a good trade, too, was it not?

Mr. President, I have a list here of similar statistics. I will not take the time of the Senate to read them, but I ask unanimous consent to insert them at this place in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

France granted us a supplementary, or increased, quota equal to about 615,000 bushels on apples and pears. This was an increase of about 50 percent over our shipments to France in 1935, the year when the agreement was under negotiation. In 1937 our shipment of apples in baskets to France was only 32 percent of our shipments in 1935, instead of 50 percent more; of apples in boxes, 77 percent of the 1935 shipments instead of 50 percent more; and of apples in barrels only 60 percent of the 1935 shipments instead of 50 percent more. Our shipments of pears were also less in 1937 than in 1935, although only 5 percent less. Nevertheless, we were entitled to a 50-percent increase.

In the case of Finland, we shipped in 1937 only 123 metric tons of lard in 1937 of a quota of 1,000 metric tons granted in the trade agreement of 1936. This was only 12.3 percent of the quota.

Of a quota on automobiles of 4,812 units granted by Switzerland in 1936, we supplied only 2,485 units in 1937, or slightly more than 50 percent.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, we do not know just what were the concessions we granted in return for these quotas, but, whatever they were, we obtained rather hollow ones in return. We see the "mitigation of barriers" was in a great many cases an illusory mitigation for which we undoubtedly conceded reductions in duty. "Yankee horse trading" has a new meaning.

Mr. President, I fear I have spoken too long already about this matter, and I am about to conclude. I think that if we could have some standard similar to that which is proposed by the Senator from Nevada, we would not enter into such improvident transactions as those to which I have referred, and probably when the war in Europe is over we would find ourselves in the traditional position the United States of America has always sought with respect to her relations in the world—free to adapt ourselves to the then known conditions, not tied up for 3 years and 6 months beyond the date of the last so-called trade agreement entered into.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, for years we have been talking in Congress about what the American farmer is entitled to and about how essential to the success of the whole people it is that a strong, healthy agricultural base be maintained, since, of course, all prosperity flows as a consequence of a buying power in the farmer.

We have talked about what the Congress and the Government owe agriculture. There may be some room for argument as to the degree in which agriculture contributes to the prosperity of the whole Nation, but upon one assertion there will be no dispute in the Senate or elsewhere, namely, if the American farmer is entitled to anything at all, he is entitled to the American market for his production.

Without hesitance, I oppose renewal of the reciprocal trade treaty program as a program which emphatically denies to the farmer that to which we all agree he is entitled—his own market, without the competition of cheap foreign production. During the years of its trial and test we know that the trade-treaty program has put American exports of agricultural products on the downgrade and the importation of foreign agricultural production on the upgrade.

It does not answer to blame failure of the trade treaties on the prevailing wars. After all, these trade treaties were to have ended wars or prevented wars. But now, with wars raging despite the treaties, we are told that the treaties are not a success because of the wars. It would be as reasonable to argue that the wars will stop if only we will end the trade-treaty program.

Mr. President, the truth is that these trade treaties are making for a world of trouble right here at home. They have not stopped wars, but they have created some rather revolutionary minds in agricultural sections, where farmers are quite unable to understand, when they are cooperating to eliminate surpluses in production, why they must stand and watch trainloads and shiploads of that reduced commodity entering the country from foreign fields to add to the surpluses and deny them the fullness of their own market. Little wonder is it that in some of our border States, such as my own State of North Dakota, farmers are found in their fields shaking their fists at these trainloads of importations while they seek to utilize acres removed from cultivation in keeping with the provisions of law.

MUST WE ABANDON AGRICULTURE?

I know of no Member of Congress holding a brief for the cause, but there is a cause, and some American minds at last entertain the view that the day has come when agriculture must cease to be the American economic base and must give way to an industrial base; that American prosperity and trade growth are dependent upon our ability to find a foreign outlet for the production of our mills and factories, and that this outlet can be found only as America may take foreign agricultural production in exchange for the manufactured articles of the United States. In other words, there is some feeling that we must change from an agricultural dependence to an industrial dependence. Obviously this cause is splendidly served by the trade-treaty program, which finds in so many instances the interests of the American farmer being traded in the interests of American manufacturers. If this be the purpose of the trade treaties, it would be far fairer for its first sponsors to confess it and put the American farmer on notice that he is no longer considered essential to American growth and prosperity; that we are going to build an economy divorced from dependence upon agriculture and give the farmer a chance to adjust himself to the newly desired order, if it is desired. It is not fair to sneak up on him with a policy that looks to his submergence in a new economic order.

Incidentally, if this is to be the American policy, then let us prepare, as we have never thought of preparing before in a military way, to defend those channels of trade on the high seas which are to be so essential if we are to keep a stream of food flowing to feed ourselves in time of war. Two- or three-billion-dollar military programs annually will never begin to provide a sufficiency if we are to let agriculture become a secondary consideration.

FOREIGN TRADE RELATIVELY SMALL

Some of us have argued for long against the development of a war trade as a bases for American prosperity and economy. I think we could well afford to go further than that and build an economy that is not in the leastwise dependent upon foreign trade. It is demonstrated that not more than from 4 to 10 percent of our total trade is foreign trade; that 96 percent or more of our economic dependence is upon trade with ourselves. But to watch the effort, expense, time, and trouble expended to keep and enlarge upon the 4 percent would at times cause one to believe that the 96 percent was quite insignificant. Devotion to the cause of enlarging our own ability to consume our own production would very soon demonstrate how nicely we could afford to get along without dependence upon any foreign trade whatsoever.

Mr. President, I do not advocate the abandonment of foreign trade. I only advocate abandonment of our continuing dependence upon foreign trade as a leading source for our prosperity. The chance to create a larger domestic source is too great to permit us forever to be chasing after the 4-percent foreign trade rainbow that never produces as much as the cost of the chase.

Exports from the United States in 1939 are shown to equal only 4 percent of our total national income. Is it not somewhat preposterous that our State Department should continue to insist upon serving international trade interests which fatten on that 4 percent, all the while closing their eyes to the 96 percent which represents American farmers, laborers, and domestic dollars?

The reciprocal trade treaty program can be made acceptable and perhaps helpful to our economic well-being, contributing perhaps to the well-being of all other parts of the world, by merely providing that trade treaties shall be ratified by the representatives of the people here in Congress. This chance has been denied by a close vote. Now to go on facing the music that some of us have faced for the last number of years is out of the question. That music has involved the plaint of the farmer against importations in competition with his own production, his insistence that such importations be ended, only to find Members of Congress able to say there is not anything we can do about it.

The parade, Mr. President, of witnesses brought before the Congress by the various Federal departments, seeking the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, having as its objective the conferring of favors upon such additional foreign powers as they may choose to negotiate treaties with, is nonsensical. I am disappointed that Members of Congress can continue to believe that these trade agreements can be conducive to increased domestic prosperity. And the statements made by some department heads add insult to injury. Secretary Wallace said that the Tariff Act of 1930 was "the direct cause of present European wars." And Secretary Hull maintains that he must have the Trade Agreements Act renewed in order to "foster peace and harmony in the world at large."

AGRICULTURE BEARS THE BRUNT

The citizens of my State, and of the Northwest as a whole, would willingly make many sacrifices if, by so doing, they could contribute to our national welfare, reduce unemployment, and swell national income. But, after 6 years of trade agreements, we find our agricultural industry bearing the full brunt of this program, while the Nation as a whole has received little, if any, benefits.

The Department of Commerce reports show that our 1939 exports increased only 3 percent above 1938, in spite of heavy shipments of war goods abroad, while our imports jumped 18 percent; and this is cataloged as progress!

More than 1,000 items, comprising two-thirds of our dutiable list, have been reduced in the 22 trade treaties already negotiated; and these reductions have been generalized to the world at large. The duty slashes have brought the average of these rates below those of the 1922 Tariff Act, and, of course, far below those of the Hawley-Smoot Act. In fact, more than half the items which have been reduced were not increased in the 1930 act. Another 56 items are equal to 1922 rates, and only 96 are higher than the rates of the 1922 act as passed. Many 1938 and 1939 imports increased by leaps and bounds as a result of the lowered rates established via the trade agreements.

Ever since I was first honored with a seat in this distinguished body, the enigma of the farm problem in this country has troubled our membership. I say to you that we were never farther from a solution to that problem than when we countenance further tariff reductions in agricultural products, thus forcing our domestic growers to compete with the world even for our United States market. It matters not that we should appropriate funds to buy up surpluses for free distribution internally, or for subsidized exports, or that we should bestow benefit and parity checks upon our growers. If we rob them of the American market, their own market, these subsequent left-handed gestures will be of little avail.

WE CONTROL CROPS—THEN IMPORT

The farmers of my State, in spite of repeated drought and other adversity beyond their control, loyally complied with the crop-control program of the A. A. A., and in 1939 held out of production a total of 2,862,000 acres of good farm land. Growers in other States did likewise, and this session of Congress will be rewarding them with benefit and parity checks running into the hundreds of millions of dollars. But simultaneously we import agricultural products, which, according to the Raw Materials National Council, displaced the products of 43,982,410 domestic acres in 1938. The 1939 displacement figures have not been computed; but since 1939 imports of competitive farm produce increased substantially, I should not be surprised to see this figure jump to 50,000,000 acres for last year.

Thirty-two farm and business organizations in Minnesota, North and South Dakota, and Montana, with a combined membership of upward of 30,000 persons, have joined in engaging Dr. John Lee Coulter, former president of the North Dakota Agricultural College, and former member of the United States Tariff Commission, to analyze for them, in a nonpolitical manner, the effects of these trade agreements upon the Northwest. Interesting, to say the least, are some of the findings by Dr. Coulter.

The State Department tell us, for instance, that we have to give these foreign powers increased entree to our domestic markets if we expect them to boost their purchases from us. For instance, they deny our claim to a larger share of our United States sugar market than the 29 percent which domestic growers have been enjoying, claiming that this would jeopardize present exports of other farm commodities to those countries. They state, as a sample, that Cuba now takes annually 1,000,000 barrels of our spring-wheat flour, and that the spring wheat grower would lose this market if we failed to buy their sugar. It remained for Dr. Coulter to ferret out the true facts, that 900,000 barrels of this spring-wheat flour which Cuba bought was Canadian hard wheat, milled in transit in the United States, with no benefit accruing to any producer of hard spring wheat in the United States.

I have no idea how general this practice is, but it is doubtless happening in many fields, and our farmers are getting the worst of it from both ends.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota if he ever before heard of the farmers' organizations of North Dakota, or any other State at the same time being represented by the paid representative of the National Association of Manufacturers; whether he thinks there is any community of interest between the farmers of North Dakota and the National Association of Manufacturers?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I have been more than a little interested by finding the differing representations which have been taking the same ground in this particular controversy, growing out of the continuation of the trade-treaty program. If the Senator is making reference to any contact which might be that of Dr. Coulter, whom I am quoting this afternoon, I should like to call attention to the names of the associations in Minnesota, Montana, South Dakota, and North Dakota, which Dr. Coulter is representing.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I heard Dr. Coulter put them in the record of the House Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. NYE. I ask unanimous consent to incorporate those names in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BONE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Nevertheless, it is a fact that Dr. Coulter appeared before the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee of the House principally as the representative of the National Association of Manufacturers; in other words, as the successor of the notorious Mulhall, who formerly represented that association before the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Mr. NYE. All of which may be and, with the Senator from Missouri as the authority, probably is true; but it does not alter the course of events. It does not alter a sympathy in the Northwest which is born out of actual experience under the conduct of the program of these trade treaties.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, my only reason for interrupting the Senator at all was his statement that Dr. Coulter was employed to make an entirely dispassionate and nonpartisan survey of the situation. I may say that in the years I have been around Washington I never heard a more partisan presentation of a case than that made by Dr. Coulter.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I had recited the case revealing how it was represented that unless we continued taking Cuban sugar we could not hope for a continued market in Cuba for this abundance of hard spring wheat flour, and then demonstrating that only one-tenth of this outlet of our hard spring wheat flour was the result of purchases made from the American farmer. Nine-tenths of it was the result of wheat brought in from Canada, milled in bond in the United States, and the product shipped on into Cuba.

PENALIZING OUR OWN SECURITY

In addition to grains of all kinds, we produce cattle, dairy products, hogs, sheep and wool, poultry, and other products, each of which has somehow been penalized in one or more instances in the agreements already negotiated. Every additional agreement country multiplies the threat to our future agricultural security.

Even if our farmers lived in sod shanties, employed peons for their labor, and in other ways reduced their standards of living to those which obtain in numerous foreign countries which are today competing with us, it would still be impossible to compete evenly with them on those products which do not enjoy an adequate tariff wall. The difference in transportation costs via water and via rail to our native markets would still place my people at a distinct disadvantage. It is the necessity for overcoming this geographic and transportation disparity, plus our own higher living standards, not any desire to prosper at the hands of consumers, which compels our western agriculture to demand protection in the form of tariffs.

It works conversely, too. Our buying power comprises a part of the 96 percent of national income which purchases the industrial products of Eastern States. Without bolstering and protecting this great domestic market, industry never could maintain its present output, to say nothing of boosting it, as a means of reemployment of millions who are diligently seeking honest employment.

No one man could ever assimilate and understand the reams of statistics which Federal departments prepare for us, and in which are buried the pertinent facts; but it is quite possible to take some one commodity, and by diligent application gain a fair picture of the precise effect upon that product and its producers of these foreign policies, which have bequeathed us our reciprocal trade treaty snarl.

I have chosen to take the case of wool. This is a product in regard to which the growers and the domestic manufacturers saw eye to eye, and joined hands in protesting the extension of the powers which permit the State Department to become the tariff-making body of the United States, with Congress "abdicating for another 3 years," as Col. Arthur Besse, president of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, expressed the matter in testifying before the Senate Finance Committee.

Let me ask a question: Who else, besides the growers and the industrial employees and the manufacturers, are directly concerned in our domestic wool production? When these three forces employ the regular American processes of revealing their injuries before committees of Congress, and before Federal department heads, what new powerful force has risen up, within our economy, which can set aside the testimony of those groups, and arbitrarily proceed with its own theories as to what is good for America? What new power can write a vicious and dangerous foreign policy, which robs our own aggrieved citizens of a right to carry their injuries to court and seek redress? If ever there was an unconstitutional procedure witnessed by Congress, the present method of delivering our American markets over to foreign competition, with no recourse, would seem to be the most malicious and the most unsound.

PLEAS GO UNANSWERED

Member after Member of the majority party, in both Houses, has addressed himself to the Committee for Reciprocity Information, pleading for adequate tariff protection for the growers of vegetables, livestock, fruits, tobacco, sugar, copper, petroleum products, and other things produced in the United States, and in spite of the fact that the pleas go unanswered and unheeded, the same majority party drives through with a third extension of this dangerous act.

While the tariff on raw wool has not yet been cut, duties have been lowered on wool wastes, yarn, woven fabrics, felts, pile fabrics, blankets, knit fabrics, hose, gloves, and innumerable other clothing items. These cuts came largely in the agreement with Great Britain, although minor reductions were also made in the treaties with Sweden, France, and Belgium.

With the British agreement becoming effective as of January 1, 1939, let us see how the reduced tariffs on goods coming into the United States affected imports of various woolen items, as compared with like imports for the calendar year 1938, and the percentage of increase for each item.

Mr. President, at this point I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in my remarks a compilation of figures for 1938 and 1939, and a third column showing the increase in 1939 over 1938.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, these figures were furnished by F. R. Marshall, secretary of the National Wool Growers' Association. I wish to say that the farmers of my State have found sheep growing profitable, and they would like to increase their sheep population. In the face of these rising imports of woolen goods, however, I would not encourage them in such a move, for fear their receipts from the by-product, wool, may become progressively lower as the years go by. In 1932, wool manufacturers in the United States were finding that the domestic supply furnished 95 percent of their total wool requirements. By 1937 this had dropped to 72.7 percent, indicating that instead of only 5 percent of our domestic market, foreign growers had acquired 27.3 percent of that market. It is true that by 1939 this had risen again to 88 percent, with only 12 percent being fed from abroad, but this dumping of foreign wool will act as do all imports of farm products to depress our native markets for our own goods.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A moment ago the Senator referred to the statement of Colonel Besse. I do not know whether he was referring to his testimony before the Finance Committee or before the Ways and Means Committee. Did the Senator ever see the release from the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, of which Colonel Besse is president, on January 17?

Mr. NYE. I did not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the Senator permit me to give him an extract from that?

Mr. NYE. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The statement, in part, is as follows:

> The National Association of Wool Manufacturers reported yesterday that the production activity of woolen textile mills in 1939, as indicated by figures for the first 11 months of the year, was approximately 40 percent greater than in 1938 and about 5 percent less than in the post-war record year of 1935.
> The association declared that 1939 production also was 15 percent greater than in 1937 and between 5 and 10 percent higher than in 1936.
> The figures, culled from the association's monthly statistics, disclosed that consumption of apparel wool during the first 11 months of 1939 averaged 5,640,000 scoured pounds weekly, compared with an average of 3,956,000 pounds for the same period of 1938.
> Employment in wool-textile mills also was reported much better during the first 11 months of 1939, when an average of 152,000 persons were busy weekly, compared with a 122,000 weekly average in 1938.

I do not wish to take the Senator's time, but if he will permit me, I should like to read a question asked Mr. Besse, and his answer:

> Senator CLARK. I have some statistics here which I should like to ask you about, showing that for 1939, there has been activity in the woolen textile industry showing an increase from 69.1 to 102.6 percent, or an increase of 48.4 percent; on raw materials, from 82.8 percent to 125.4 percent, or an increase of 51.4 percent; on employment from 63.1 percent to 84.4 percent, an increase of 33.6 percent; on pay rolls from 50.1 to 67.7, an increase of 35.1 percent. That does not look like they have been very badly hurt in the first 10 months of 1939, does it?
> Mr. BESSE. I do not think you can take that particular period, but I do not question the figures.
> Senator CLARK. That is the only period during which the reciprocal-trade agreements have been in operation, isn't it?
> Mr. BESSE. That is entirely correct——
> Senator CLARK (interposing). So it comes down to this—

This is the same question and answer asked and given in the case of so many witnesses—> it comes down to this, it shows that you have not been hurt yet, but you are afraid you will be hurt?

> Mr. BESSE. Substantially that is what I am saying.

And Mr. Marshall, whom the Senator also just quoted, said:

> That is the principal point on which we have actually been hurt. Our main concern is the anticipation of what we feel sure is ahead of us in case you extend this act, but I must confess frankly that we have gotten off pretty well so far, but we are awfully afraid of the future.

The same thing happened with witness after witness before the committee. They all said they had not been hurt, but everyone was expressing some fear that some danger was right around the corner.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I came into the Chamber while the Senator from North Dakota was referring to the dumping of wool. Was that in the form of textile goods?

Mr. NYE. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Woven goods?

Mr. NYE. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. In reply to what the Senator from Missouri has just read, in connection with which he said that the wool growers anticipated the danger of what might happen to them, I may say that since the 1st of January the price of raw wool has dropped probably 15 percent, and today the wool growers of my State are shearing their sheep, but they cannot get a bid on their wool at any price, as a result of the importations.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I do not understand why we should look upon the testimony which has just been offered by the Senator from Missouri as being particularly an excuse for continuation of the trade-treaty program. There has been an increased market for wool in the United States, not because of the existence of the reciprocal-trade program, but there has been an increased market, and in this day, when the American farmer is looking for larger outlets for his production, how grand it would have been if he could have had larger access to that new domestic consumption which has developed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How does the Senator determine the fact that that larger domestic market is not due to the reciprocal-trade agreements, or at least in part measure due to them? For instance, one of the great industries of the United States is the automobile industry, and a sales manager of an automobile concern, officially representing that industry, came before the Finance Committee and said that that industry had been very materially benefited by the trade-agreements program. Does the Senator think that when automobile mechanics and automobile employees all over the country are receiving greater wages, that is not reflected in the domestic demand for wool and woolen products and woolen manufactured goods? Does not the Senator think that an automobile mechanic, when he has a job and is earning good wages, would not much rather have a woolen suit for his boy than a shoddy suit or a cotton suit?

Mr. NYE. That employee, that worker, that mechanic has a far larger prospect and outlook by reason of the development of a larger domestic ability to consume than is his prospect in any foreign market which might be attained.

Coming back to the insistence that the representatives of associations who appeared before the committee are anticipating more danger than will actually develop from the existence of the treaties, I should like to ask if there is not great reason for them anticipating and fearing what might happen. All this highly detrimental wool tariff tampering came in spite of repeated assurances by the President of the United States himself, who, in 1934, in correspondence released by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], said:

> My concern that agricultural prices should be protected and, where possible, substantially raised ought to be well known by this time. This is why I was surprised that a question should be raised about wool.

Producers of other agricultural and industrial commodities have received like assurance from the executive heads of our Government that they had no reason to worry. This was true as to zinc, as to the excise taxes on oil and lumber, and as to numerous other commodities; but the duties were cut, and the amazed producers found they had no recourse or redress.

NO PRODUCT SAFE FROM COLLAPSE

Small wonder, then, that my people should fear for their flax markets, their dairy products, their livestock, and their small grains. This very day there is no single product which the farmers of my State produce which I would feel free to tell them would be safe from collapse because of the trade-treaty program, in the event the authorization is renewed.

I liked the way Colonel Besse pointed to the fact that the Federal Government is only adding to its toil because of these trade agreements. I quote from his statement, as follows:

The farmers and other beneficiaries of these trade treaties have been so singularly and stubbornly unappreciative of the benefits which they have received that it has been necessary to spend an enormous amount of time, energy, and money in laying before them a picture of the advantages which they have derived from the program. Mr. Hull, Mr. Wallace, Mr. Sayre, Mr. Grady, Mr. Berle, Mr. Long, Mr. Edminster, Mr. Fox, and others have been obliged to prepare and deliver countless addresses to these unappreciative recipients all over the country.

He proposes that they be spared so much exertion in the future.

Colonel Besse then reveals the queer reasoning of the State Department when he explains why Senate ratification is opposed:

Mr. Grady says that the Senate will not approve such treaties when they are presented for ratification. Mr. Grady seems to think that if his technical experts work up an agreement with Australia and bring it to you for approval you will turn it down. Accordingly, realizing this, he asks you for a blank check in advance, giving your blanket approval to such treaties as he may negotiate in the future. The theory seems to be that you should give enthusiastic prior endorsement to a group of unacceptable treaties, none of which you would sanction if presented to you separately.

Which, it seems to me, is a pretty direct way of putting the challenge at this time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not wish to continue to interrupt the Senator from North Dakota; but, since the Senator is quoting the testimony of Colonel Besse as his bible, I desire to call attention to the fact that, on page 430 of the hearings before the Senate Finance Committee, Colonel Besse admitted that his association had been down here bitterly opposing the enactment of the original Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act in 1934, that he had come back and opposed the extension of that act in 1937, and that he was back here opposing it again this year, in spite of the fact that his industry was very much better off in 1937 than it had been in 1934, and very much better off now than it was in 1937. So that Mr. Besse's testimony was very well summed up in this, if the Senator will permit me to read:

Senator CLARK. If the whole system of trade agreements had gone into effect—and I take it that you will agree that the wool-textile industry profits from an increase in the general purchasing power in the United States just like every other business——

Mr. BESSE (interposing). I will agree with you that we profit from any increase in the general purchasing power, but I cannot agree with you that the increase in purchasing power was due to the effects of the trade treaties.

Senator CLARK. I am just calling attention to the fact that during the full operation of the year of the Smoot-Hawley bill your industry was at the very lowest point in its entire history, and that under the reciprocal-trade agreements a very much improved situation has been created; isn't that true?

Mr. BESSE. Not in my opinion due to the trade agreements.

Senator CLARK. Perhaps not; but whether or not you have been hurt by the trade agreement, you are a great deal better off than you were when the trade-agreement system started aren't you?

Mr. BESSE. Surely. So is everybody else.

Senator CLARK. Precisely. That is exactly my contention.

So that the witness summoned by the Senator from North Dakota himself was witness to the fact that not only his own industry but every other industry in the United States was vastly better off than it was when the trade-agreements policy was first considered.

Mr. NYE. But Mr. Besse insisted that whatever improvement had been accomplished and noted in their industry was an improvement not traceable to the trade-treaty program.

Mr. President, the wool manufacturer predicts that we will shortly witness excessive woolen imports, whereupon all we can do is ask the President to call up King George and plead, "Please, sir, would you mind if we rescinded our tariff cuts on woolens so that some of our weavers can go back to work?" He adds:

We know that King George is a man in whom the instinct of fair play is well developed, but, nonetheless, we prefer that the power to determine American tariff rates remain in Congress rather than in the British Government.

Then speaking directly of the joint interests of the growers and the industry, he says:

There have been threats that the duty on woolen products would be reduced ever since 1935; the English are even now asking additional concessions. Ever since 1935 there has been the likelihood of a reduction in the duty on wool through a treaty with Australia, the Union of South Africa, Argentina, Chile, or Uruguay. Our textile mills do not produce raw wool, but it is the raw material which we use, and we have to have large stocks on hand to enable us to maintain manufacturing operations during the course of the year, until nature grows another fleece which can be sheared from the sheep in the spring. The immediate inventory loss which might have to be taken in the event of a cut in the wool duty has hung over the head of every wool grower, wool dealer, textile mill, garment manufacturer, and other makers of wool products for 5 years.

When imports of woven piece goods jumped from 3,865,000 pounds in 1938, to 6,891,000 in 1939, I do not blame any manufacturer or grower for viewing with alarm the reductions on other woolen goods, similar to those which were granted as of January 1, 1939, and which accounted largely for the stupendous increase recorded last year.

The crux of the whole discussion of competitive production abroad seems to me to be reached in the computation of a large manufacturer of woolens, Col. M. D. Brown, of Continental Mills, Philadelphia. Herein lies the threat to our native producer, irrespective of whether the duty on raw wools should be subsequently slashed. He takes a certain piece of topcoating, weighing 19 ounces per yard, which costs his firm $2.99 without shipping charges or selling expenses. In American money, at normal exchange, that fabric can be made in England or Scotland, not including shipping charges and selling expenses, for $1.52. Under the Tariff Act of 1930, that fabric, made abroad, would have added to its cost upon import a compensatory duty for the protection of the wool grower of 60 cents, and an ad valorem duty of 55 percent to protect American labor, bringing the price to $2.95.

This is 4 cents less than our factory cost, and competitive conditions are equal, which is all we ask.

Under reciprocal trade treaty rates, however, at normal exchange, the ad valorem duties are whittled down, and the price becomes $2.73. Then, with the British pound at a discount of 20 percent in relation to the dollar, the Englishman's finished product, made from foreign wools, is thrown on the market at a cost of only $2.31.

It is perfectly obvious that this disparity in cost of production, even without subsequent cuts in raw wool proper, would quickly ruin our American wool growers, disperse the trained American labor which has manned the manufacturing plants of this country, and drive our industrial plants into bankruptcy.

Recognizing this situation, I do not blame Undersecretary of State Sumner Welles for ordering six new suits of British woolens after he had finished visiting with British royalty recently. The State Department seems to be one of the beneficiaries of this trade-treaty program. Whether or not the wool growers of this country ever own six new suits of clothes in their entire lives does not matter.

I say again that the spectacle of Mr. Marshall, representing the wool growers of this country, and the men who represent the wool manufacturers, standing on the same ground, and pleading that attention be given to the joint woolen interests in this Nation, is a wholesome thing. But they are probably wasting their breath, for a State Department, which would "blend our economy into the world economy" will ultimately riddle them both, unless checked in its reckless program.

PROPAGANDISTS HAVE BEEN ACTIVE

Propaganda artists worked night and day prior to the opening of this session of Congress to produce pamphlets which recited the "benefits that have flowed to each of our 48 States as a result of this trade-agreement program."

Their leaflet states:

Concessions obtained on American products not produced in North Dakota, such as cotton goods, plate glass, typewriters, chemicals, and numerous others, indirectly benefit the citizens of North Dakota.

For that nebulous and questionable gain we are expected amicably to surrender our domestic markets to imported grains, livestock, and livestock products entering over absurdedly low tariff walls, having ultimately to compete, in every item we grow, with the serfs and peons of foreign lands. It is too much to expect. It is a preposterous thing to expect.

The reciprocal trade treaty program could have been made acceptable. Treaties helpful to our economic well-being, and possibly contributing to the well-being of all other parts of the world, could have been made possible merely by providing that trade treaties shall be ratified by the representatives of the people in Congress. That chance, however, has been pretty definitely denied by a close vote in the Senate. To go on facing the music—the music some of us have faced for the past number of years—is out of the question. That music has merely involved the plaint of the farmer, day in and day out, against importations in competition with his own production, and his insistence that such importations be ended, only to find us, Members of Congress, able to say, "There is nothing we can do about it."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Calloway, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker pro tempore had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 8641) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, to provide supplemental appropriations for such fiscal year, and for other purposes, and it was signed by the Vice President.

PROPAGANDA ENTRANCE OF UNITED STATES INTO WAR

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President I shall detain the Senate only a few moments. When I picked up the New York Herald Tribune today I noticed the headline: "Get United States into war at any cost, Ontario official urges Canada."

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me so that I may suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. HOLT. No. I wish to speak only a few minutes. I thank the Senator from California.

The headline is: "Get United States into war at any cost, Ontario official urges Canada."

I think it is worth the time of the Senate, as we are gradually slipping into war—and we are—to take time to consider what the attorney general of Ontario said about getting the United States into war. Let me quote it:

The Ontario Attorney General Gordon Conant told an audience of farmers and businessmen today that it was Canada's duty to "do everything within our power to enlist the active support of the United States in the cause of the Allies."

Saying the success of the Allied cause "may be very doubtful" unless active participation of the United States is made effective at an early date, Conant declared:

"No sacrifice on our part will be too great if that can be accomplished.

"If the United States wants to build the St. Lawrence waterway, by all means let us join them"—

Think of that! Get us into the war by giving us the bait of the St. Lawrence waterway. Give us anything to get us into war—

"If they want access to Alaska over Canadian soil, there should be no hesitation in settling the matter. In fact, nothing short of impairment of our status as a sovereign nation would be too much for Canada to offer as a sacrifice on the altar of liberty and freedom.

"We have prided ourselves and rejoiced in the fact that we have been good neighbors. But now we have a greater responsibility, a greater duty, a greater opportunity to do everything within our power to enlist the active support of the United States in the cause of the Allies."

What greater responsibility, what greater duty than being a good neighbor? Quoting the attorney general:

To do everything within our power to enlist the active support of the United States in the cause of the Allies.

Is not that a wonderful good-neighbor policy? Are they good neighbors only if they can use us? Let me say that I do not hold the Canadian people responsible for the statement of the attorney general of Ontario any more than I hold the American people responsible for the speech at Toronto of the large Democratic campaign contributor, Jimmie Cromwell. Neither was speaking for the American people. Neither was speaking for the Canadian people. They were speaking, not expecting publicity. The Canadians are our good neighbors and friends; but nothing is more important to some than to get the United States into the war.

"The Allies need America. They need and will be accorded every support that this great northern part of the American Continent can extend. But they need even more the moral and particularly the material resources of our great neighboring republic to the south.

"If Canada can bring about the active participation of the United States of America in support of the Allied cause particularly at the present time she may go down in history as the savior of democracy, of liberty, of freedom, of civilization itself."

The cry: Give up anything to get the United States into the war.

"Every day the United States delays in joining the Allies will only prolong the war and increase the effort and the sacrifice that the United States may yet be called upon to make to save herself from the fate that now threatens all the democracies of the world.

"In the last war their entry undoubtedly turned the scales and resulted in victory, which materialized in November 1918."

He differs with Mr. Churchill, who said that the United States got in in time to get its glory. But let me proceed:

With their vast resources and materials and men—

Listen to that—"and men." He goes a little further than our Neutrality Act.

"With their vast resources and materials and men and their industrial capacity added to those of the Allies their could be no question as to the outcome.

"A clear declaration of policy at this time supporting the Allies and declaring it to be the intention of the United States to enter the contest in their behalf would materially affect the whole situation probably to the extent of bringing an end to hostilities.

"Surely Germany would see the futility of her mad project. She would be unable to enlist in her support in that event the forces of Italy, of Russia, of the Balkan states, or any of the neutral states. I am confident she would seek an early peace rather than risk the ultimate extermination that would be her fate."

Now, I want the Senate to listen to something, not about Canada. We are not responsibile for the Ontario attorney general, even if we are responsible for Jimmie Cromwell, a nice man to have around at election time, because of a marriage. The Ontario attorney general speaks about his dear friend who was appointed Minister to Canada. Let me add:

Referring to an address by James H. R. Cromwell, American Minister to Canada, here 2 weeks ago, Conant said the Minister had stripped the disguise from the various positions of neutrals in no uncertain terms.

"His speech was the most forthright and accurate evaluation of the situation that has yet been delivered by any neutral statesman," he said.

They cannot be beaten for diplomacy. Listen to this:

"It is gratifying to know that while Mr. Cromwell's speech was officially, and perhaps necessarily, repudiated by Mr. Cordell Hull, the Secretary of State, the American statesmen have not disguised the fact that he expressed American opinion accurately, if impudently."

Does he mean it was impudence to say that we are going to see the American boys sent across the seas? "Don't tell the boys until we are ready to send them."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLT. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the Senator regard the statement of the distinguished Canadian publicist as being equivalent to a charge that the Secretary of State of the United States had his tongue in his cheek when he delivered a stinging rebuke to our playboy Ambassador, which would have caused any man with the slightest vestige of self-respect to have resigned?

Mr. HOLT. Of course. However, he paid $50,000 or more for the job, and it is pretty hard to give it up. Let me say that everyone knows that Mr. Cromwell was not expressing officially the viewpoint of the people of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HOLT. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I certainly did not wish to create the impression that I agree with the Canadian attorney general in his estimation of the action of the Secretary of State. I have known the Secretary of State of the United States too long not to know that he was restraining his indignation instead of exaggerating it when he publicly rebuked Mr. Cromwell for his ill-timed speech.

Mr. HOLT. Let me say, as one who has opposed many of the policies of the Secretary of State, that I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Missouri, because I think the Secretary of State would have gone further if he had not been restrained.

Let me quote further from the article:

> Let us hope that Mr. Cromwell did express the sentiments of the great majority of the people of the United States of America. But let us also hope that action and not merely professions of faith will follow.
> In his speech Cromwell said a victory for the Allies was necessary to the welfare of the United States.

In other words, "Do not merely be a good neighbor to us. We will get you into the war to fight our battle. Do not merely say, 'We like you,' but send your boys over to fight our battle in Europe."

I say again, the Canadian people are not responsible for Mr. Conant, any more than the American people are responsible for the Cromwells, the Bullitts, and the other tea hounds who are serving as a result of campaign contributions. No; the Canadian people are not any more responsible. Nevertheless, those individuals are on the scene. The reason why I am calling the attention of the Senate to this today is to show that there are forces trying to take the United States of America into the war. No matter how much some individuals in Washington wish to profess that there is no danger of our entrance into the war, I think, speaking frankly and conscientiously, that the United States of America is slipping and stepping into the World War.

I hate to say that; but I honestly believe it. I hope I am wrong; but I am convinced that there are forces pushing here and forces pushing there.

Mr. President, why, do you think, is England today cutting down on her imports from the United States? Is it because they say they have to conserve their cash or because they desire to create a sentiment in America for doing away with the Neutrality Act, so far as cash is concerned, in order that we will finally finance the present war as we financed the last war? It will be only tomorrow when we will be faced with that, and we must choose between doing away with the cash provision or shutting down some of the factories that are selling materials to England. We are going to have to make that choice; but, so far as I am concerned, I would rather see the last export to any foreign country stay on our side of the shore than to send across the ocean a single American boy in order to provide profits for a few individuals in this country.

Oh, no; this incident is not like a declaration of war; but, step by step, we are getting closer and closer to the conflict in Europe.

The President of the United States, speaking at Chautauqua, N. Y., said very ably, and I think his statement is worth repeating here—

> We can keep out of war if those who watch and decide make certain that the small decisions of each day do not lead toward war and if, at the same time, they possess the courage to say "No" to those who selfishly or unwisely would let us go to war.

That is what we need—the courage to say "No." But step by step we are proceeding in the direction of war. Every day we read something in the newspapers which shows we are getting closer and closer and closer to it. Every day we are watching those "small decisions" toward war.

They are using every type of propaganda. I hope the time will soon come when the United States Senate will adopt the resolution of the Senator from Missouri to investigate propaganda, not alone Nazi or Communist, reprehensible as they may be, but also let us take the cloak off the English propaganda which is permeating America through lectures, through social affairs, through newspaper control, through pictures, and in many other ways.

Just the other night Lord Lothian—the Marquis of Lothian, or the Earl of Lothian, I should say, to be polite—invited 300 Americans to give $10 apiece to listen to English concert artists at the English Embassy. They are good; there is no question about that.

The money was to be sent over for the relief of England. I will wager that if one were to write those 300 guests and ask them to donate $2—not $10, but $2—for the relief of some poor, unfortunate persons in the United States of America, he would find that many of them did not have time to take care of the invitation. Oh, yes; the English are steadily advancing in their propaganda. They are using every opportunity to get to the proper people.

Now let me say that recently there was a British propaganda film shown. All Senators were invited to come and see it. We got "Annie Oakleys"; we got in free, because they wanted us. Here is the letter I received:

> Senator RUSH D. HOLT,
> Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.
> DEAR SIR: Last week we held a screening of The Lion Has Wings for a group of ranking—

Listen to this—

> for a group of ranking Army, Navy, Coast Guard, and National Guard officers, and members of the Civil Aeronautics Authority. They were surprised and greatly impressed with the details of aerial offense, defense, and mechanical equipment which is disclosed in this picture. It has been suggested to us that it would also be of great interest to you in view of your committee affiliations in Congress.

What is my committee affiliation in Congress? I am a member of the Naval Affairs Committee. It was desired to put us in the right attitude to see the danger of invasion.

I continue with the letter:

> The Lion Has Wings is Great Britain's answer to the threat of Planes Over London. When war was declared, Alexander Korda (the greatest English director) had a skeleton script written—and then used events as they happened to make the picture. He worked with the full cooperation of the Royal Flying Corps and has produced an amazingly frank and thrillingly exciting film.

Here is the nice thing—

> We are attaching a pass, which will be good any time during the engagement, which starts Wednesday, March 6 (probably for 1 week), and will be very happy to have you as our guest.
> Sincerely,

> By A. M. TOLKINS.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLT. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. I think the Senator received complimentary tickets to see "Mr. Smith goes to Washington." I wonder if that was a part of the propaganda, too?

Mr. HOLT. I may say, as to that, that it represented some Senators very well, and the Senator can use that, too, if it fits him.

Mr. PEPPER. I was just wondering if the Senator was basking in any reflected glory that he was able to observe?

Mr. HOLT. If the Senator will explain his last remark I will be glad to know what it means.

Mr. PEPPER. The latter remark was made upon the inference that I deduced from the Senator's remark. If I was in error about that, he would not understand my suggestion.

Mr. HOLT. Does the Senator from Florida contend that there is no British propaganda in America?

Mr. PEPPER. No; but the fact that the Senator gets complimentary tickets to moving pictures does not prove that the British are propagandizing everything, for we get complimentary tickets to many things.

Mr. HOLT. I agree that the Senator from Florida does. Some even get free trips to see the sugar fields of Florida. [Laughter.]

Mr. PEPPER. Does the Senator know of any trip that is more enjoyable and profitable than a trip such as that?

Mr. HOLT. No; it is far more enjoyable than keeping some Florida interests alive by the Federal Treasury.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLT. Of course, I am glad to yield to the Senator from Florida before I proceed further.

Mr. PEPPER. Does the Senator from West Virginia intend to compliment the Senator from Florida upon his representation of the State of Florida, or is the Senator lamenting the fact that his State has not gotten as much as he would like to have obtained out of the Federal Treasury?

Mr. HOLT. No. I may say to the Senator from Florida that Florida should not have any criticism at all of the Senator from Florida except that he did not get the Florida Ship Canal through as he was supposed to do. However, he has done a good job in getting for Florida its share. But that is far from the subject of propaganda.

Proceeding with the matter, I may say that, step by step, the news is bringing out the very fact that Colonel Lindbergh, in speaking last fall, was criticized for stating, namely, that certain interests in Canada would try to involve us in war. Let me quote what Colonel Lindbergh said and let it be considered in the light of subsequent events. Here is what Colonel Lindbergh said on October 13:

> We must protect our sister American nations from foreign invasion, both for their welfare and our own. But, in turn, they have a duty to us. They should not place us in the position of having to defend them in America while they engage in wars abroad. Can we rightfully permit any country in America to give bases to foreign warships, or to send its army abroad to fight while it remains secure in our protection at home? We desire the utmost friendship with the people of Canada. If their country is ever attacked, our Navy will be defending their seas, our soldiers will fight on their battlefields, our fliers will die in their skies. But have they the right to draw this hemisphere into European war simply because they prefer the Crown of England to American independence?

Furthermore, he said:

> Sooner or later we must demand the freedom of this continent and its surrounding islands from the dictates of European power. American history clearly indicates this need. As long as European powers maintain their influence in our hemisphere, we are likely to find ourselves involved in their troubles, and they will lose no opportunity to involve us.

May I repeat that:

> They will lose no opportunity to involve us.

Everybody who knows anything knows that there is a great amount of propaganda to get us in.

Mr. President, I may say that the Canadian people are among the finest people in the world; some of the most enjoyable times I have ever had in my life have been spent in Canada; but I say it is time for someone to rise and condemn Canadian officials when they say that they will involve us by giving us the St. Lawrence waterway or giving us a road to Alaska. It is time for some person in Washington to rise and say, "Yes, but we know it is bait, and we will not go into the war on such terms and as the result of propaganda; that we remember too well the propaganda that the war is one for liberty, for civilization. We know the penalty, when you say that you will pay us in order to drag us into the war."

That is why I rise, not to condemn Canada, not to condemn Canadians, but at least to raise my feeble voice in order that the American people may be vigilant to the ever-increasing danger of our moving toward war. That is why I raise my voice, because I sincerely believe it, much as I should like to believe otherwise.

But, as far as that is concerned, to those in Europe I would say, as Premier King said, not after the war but before it—and I quote him:

> The idea that every 20 years this country, which has done all it can to run itself, should feel called upon to save periodically a continent which cannot run itself seems to me a nightmare and sheer madness. * * * In a war to save the liberties of others, and thus our own, we should not sacrifice our own liberty or our own unity.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, can the Senator indicate the date of that utterance by Mr. King?

Mr. HOLT. No; I cannot. It was preceding the war. I shall be able to get the date. I came to the floor without preparation for this speech, or I should have gone more into detail as to that matter.

Mr. NYE. It was not a matter of years, however?

Mr. HOLT. Oh, no; it was during the last year preceding the war. They got into the war, however. I heard in Europe, when I was over there, that Canada would declare war on Germany, and I wondered why Canada would declare war because of our Neutrality Act. What did I hear there? I was told "You are mistaken about that. If Canada declares war on Germany, it makes a stronger case in America to get the Neutrality Act revised." I do not say that Members of this body felt that way, but that is the way some felt in Europe at the time.

I hope I have brought to the attention of the Senate the fact that there are forces abroad and forces in America, forces in Washington and forces in the Diplomatic Corps of America, that seek to get us into the war. That is a pretty strong statement, but I will stand back of it, and say that Americans will not accept the bait of Canada and go into the war and send American men across the sea.

Mr. McCARRAN subsequently said: Mr. President, this afternoon the able junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT] uttered sentiments on the floor of the Senate to which I give my whole-hearted support. The time has arrived when the American people, through their chosen representatives, will make known not only to peoples abroad but to those closer to us, that neither the attorney general of Ontario nor the American representative to Canada, with all his millions, can bring about the shedding of the blood of American youth to save a disaster which Europe brought upon itself.

Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD some remarks delivered by me before the American Legion of Nevada which dwell upon the subject discussed by the Senator from West Virginia.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARMISTICE DAY ADDRESS BY SENATOR PAT M'CARRAN AT LAS VEGAS, NEV., NOVEMBER 11, 1939

Twenty-one years ago today the hearts of America and the hearts of the civilized world rejoiced. In the torn fields of Europe, where carnage and devastation had held sway, the gladdening expression, "Finis la guerre," was heard everywhere. Enemy embraced enemy. Guns were silenced, and the bells of Christendom rang out as though the Saviour had returned to the world.

The joy that came to European countries by the signing of the armistice was thrice ardent in this land of ours, because we had marshaled the flower of American manhood; we had summoned the strength of American womanhood; we had mobilized the forces of national resources in the one great, noble thought to make the world safe for democracy, and we had said to the bleeding and torn countries abroad that the strength of our manhood and the encouraging presence of our womanhood should be sent to them at all hazards; that we as a nation, loving peace, should engage in war to make an end of war.

We sought no territorial gains. We asked for no political advantages. We visualized no economic supremacy; nor did we by the treaty closing the war obtain any of these.

Our boys in arms who had gone abroad, anxious and joyous to be in the fray, returned leaving behind them the sweetness of youth, and the white crosses that marked the resting place of their brothers. Those of the boys of 1917 who returned, or who served in cantonments at home, are men now, mature men. The babes in arms of 1917 are boys now, boys subject to call, subject to military service.

Twenty-one years have elapsed. This Nation, with its teeming millions, has paid the price of its Utopian heraldry, to fight a war to put an end to war. It has paid the price in the blood and lives of those who sleep abroad. It has paid the price in those who, worse than dead, linger on to curse the gas that burned out their vitals and left them but a shell, to tell the story of a heroism unappreciated by the lands and the countries far away. It has paid the price by an economic change involving millions of unemployed in a land teeming with plenty and a national debt that would bewilder those less courageous.

Today, it is my honor, by your courteous invitation, to speak to the ex-service men, who 21 years ago heard the word that the war was ended. May I not at the outset invite you to dwell on the impelling factors that led a peaceful, peace-loving Nation in the Western Hemisphere into a European war.

Human memory is short; human hearts are forgiving, and human passions subside with time, and only few there are who are at all inclined to give their attention to history. As we look back over the last quarter of a century, we might be inclined to believe that that which we choose to term the World War was the only war of magnitude that Europe had known, and yet if we but turn the pages of history, we find that in the last 700 years, 361 wars have been fought and won or lost in the very center of Europe; yea, in that center where the zenith of civilization has held sway; where art and culture and refinement and Christianity has found most extended latitude.

And even more reflection is enlightening and interesting, although it may be exceedingly depressing. It is but a few months ago that we as a Nation celebrated the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the signing of the Constitution of the United States, the establishment of a constitutional democracy in the Western Hemisphere, where individual human liberty was the paramount thought; a century and a half since we established our beloved Government, and announced to the world our intention to live at peace with the nations of the earth, and to bring to our people the greatest quantum of contentment and prosperity. In that period of 150 years, the nations abroad who had called us to their side in the World War, were in fact only passing through another of the prevailing conflicts that had engaged the attention of European nations.

In the last 150 years, Great Britain has fought a total of 54 wars, lasting in all, 102 years; in the last 150 years, the British Empire has been at war 68 percent of the time. In the last century and a half, France has engaged in 53 wars, lasting 99 years; in the last 150 years, France has been at war 66 percent of the time. And, indeed, were we to look at the record of our World War enemy, the German Empire, we would find but little less encouragement.

If our Utopian idea of making the world safe for democracy, by sending our boys and arms across the wide expanse of ocean to aid friendly nations in a struggle against their foes had prevailed since we became a constitutional government, it would have been necessary for us to have a standing army at every port of embarkation in the United States, during every year of our national existence.

What aroused this country in 1917 to enter into a conflict that had then been going on with frightful consequences for more than 3 years? Who set the stage upon which we as a nation were to play? What dexterous limner touched the scenes and fixed the wings in this stage of tragedy, on which we were to take a leading part? What honeyed words and fetching phrases dressed the lines that we were to utter in the tragedy of blood and hell?

For 3 years, from 1914 to 1917, we sailed the stormy seas, implanted with pitfalls on every hand, and kept our colors flying, maintained our dignity as a nation, and held the admiration of civilized men everywhere; but while we were so engaged, powerful personalities, plans, and policies were "apothecaring" the mixture that would put us on a national jag.

It is history now, history that has been written by fearless men possessed of undeniable information, that this God-fearing, liberty-loving, peaceful Nation was led into the World War by a system of cajoling propaganda, working in conjunction with far-flung credit that had been extended to warring nations, that led us to the brink and over the top into war in 1917.

The mission of Lord Northcliffe, one of the then greatest publishers in the world, fortified with British millions, the strategic writings of Rudyard Kipling, Sir James Barrie, Bernard Shaw, John Galsworthy, and H. G. Wells, together with the inflammatory portrayal of scenes and situations, without foundation—these and a thousand other things constituted the trappings, as it were, on the stage where we were to play the awful part.

No less an authority than Sidney Rogerson, of London, England, in his book entitled "Propaganda in the Next War," published only a few months ago, speaking of the then threatened, now existent war, brings to our vision that which led us into the World War. Dwelling on present conditions, this eminent writer says:

"We (England) shall require to do much propaganda to keep the United States benevolently neutral. To persuade her to take our part will be much more difficult. It will need a definite threat to America, a threat, moreover, which will have to be brought home by propaganda to every citizen before the Republic will again take arms in an external quarrel."

Again I quote this great British author when he says:

"Fortunately, with America our propaganda is on firm ground. We can be entirely sincere, as our main plank will be the old democratic one. We shall (he says) send over our leading lights and other men well known in the United States to put our point of view over the dinner table."

And again this author says:

"Our trouble here (in England) will be to find men with equally commanding reputations to step into the shoes of such men as Rudyard Kipling, Sir James Barrie, Bernard Shaw, John Galsworthy, and H. G. Wells."

And so, ex-service men and fellow citizens of America, we may look at the future, mirrored as it were by our experience and the disclosed history of the past.

By propaganda dealt out to a free, ambitious, liberty-loving people, and by using the sacred name of democracy, our beloved form of government, by shocking our sensibilities through the portrayal of unfounded inhumanities, our Nation was aroused to a fever pitch, and we played the awful part until the curtain dropped 21 years ago today.

The war that we fought did not end war. The struggle in which we participated, like every struggle of its kind, settled nothing. The world was not made "safe for democracy." But bewildered mankind, seeking leadership out of the tragedy of war's aftermath, made it possible for mediocre beings to become dictators and to wield the destiny of the lives of millions mentally and morally superior to them.

The devastation of war always furnishes a vantage ground for the egomaniac. Despair, anger, heartache, and discouragement prevailing in war-torn nations and peoples constitute elements that make possible the setting up of principles and policies that would not be tolerated in calm moments of civilized tranquillity; and so the world views a spectacle today that calls for another coming of a great spirit to bring God back into the hearts of men.

For 21 years, from out your ranks, men of former service, there has gone up the appeal, the demand, for peace. Your powerful group, in your beloved America, has given great impetus to the Nation's policy of contributing to the peace of the world, and what a splendid contribution this country made when as a government we declared by statute that we would lend our efforts toward world peace by refusing to sell to countries at war arms, munitions, or implements of destruction. We took a lofty stand, in keeping with your demands. We beckoned to civilized mankind to join our ranks under a God-given banner of peace. We told this generation and the generations yet to come that we would rather bear the burden of taxation, feed the hungry, clothe the naked, shelter the shelterless, in peace, than to accumulate the money of the world by the sale of instruments and poison gasses to augment war abroad, and take the lives of warriors, civilians, and noncombatants alike.

But while we were thus holding the banner of world peace and inviting civilized peoples to join with us, ingenious military minds were building the Maginot line, and those looking toward an inevitable future war, were, with equal energy, building the Siegfried line. While we were encouraging peace, secret agreements were being formulated, looking to future war. While we were invoking international law in furtherance of peace, undeclared, murderous wars were set in motion, and the law of nations was merely smirked at.

And so, 21 years from the day on which you heard the bells ringing announcing the great tidings of an armistice, today in the very heart of civilized Europe, today in the very cradle of civilization, mass murder is on again in the form of war; and this Nation, while changing its policy that contributed so much by precept and example to the peace of the world, is taking drastic steps to avoid involvement.

We have now raised the embargo, and we have told the world that we will sell the deadly instrumentalities for human destruction, that we will sell the hellish gas and the flesh-burning flame that in turn will snap out the lives of innocent women and children; that we will sell the bombing planes and machine guns and powder to drive deadly projectiles, all for cash.

By embargoing these things, we had a noble ambition. We made a lofty gesture. We declared a worthy policy, that peace might have an impetus, and that political balance of power and commercial supremacy might take a secondary place to that which would bring about contentment in the hearts of men. Something has caused us to abandon that ambition, black-out that gesture and renounce that policy. Something has caused the declared resolution and preferment of plan announced by our greatest leaders to be abandoned.

And now, on this, the twenty-first anniversary of an occasion that brought great joy to the world, we find ourselves, wittingly or otherwise, intervenors in a war abroad, in which, in reality, our country has no concern. We are going to place in the hands of foreign belligerents the instruments whereby they may destroy each other, whereby they may prolong mass murder, every day of the prolongation of which threatens and forebodes our involvement.

WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE?

In the language familiar to you who served in the World War, may we inquire, "Where do we go from here?"

In an effort to keep aloof from the war abroad, we have embargoed American vessels; thus to keep the American flag out of combat zones. We have made it criminal for an American citizen to travel on the ships of the nations at war. All this and more has been done to insure, if possible, that the United States of America, struggling under the burdens of the last war, listening to the cries of our wounded, not yet dead, pleading for reasonable payments of honorable debts, honorably contracted, shall not become involved in the war now going on, for a commercial and political balance of power, in far-off Europe.

I can hear the resolution uttered from the hearts of my listeners and the people at large. I can hear that resolution coming from determined beings, as it comes from me:

"America shall not send her manhood to a foreign soil, to become warriors in foreign wars."

That resolution is today uppermost in the minds of millions in our land. That resolution is enshrined in the heart of every American mother; that resolution is today a sacred and sanctified thing. In place of the familiar verse of 1917: "We won't come back 'till it's over, over there," we are resolutely sending the message: "We won't be over, 'till it's over, over there."

In place of that familiar jingle of 1917: "The Yanks are coming," we are announcing to the warring peoples: "The Yanks are not coming"; because, for the United States, there is a permanent stop-light on that "long, long way to Tipperary."

Let us not forget that we passed through a similar period in our history. What declaration could have been more pronounced between 1914 and 1917 than that this country, while furnishing money and munitions to warring countries abroad, would never send our soldiers over there.

I have drawn the attention of my listeners to the agencies that led us into the World War, and I have made mention of but a slight part of the organized propaganda, the results of which are to be viewed in every veterans' hospital in America, and the silent testimonial of the sentinel who paces the beat at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier.

Is the stage being constructed again? Are its wings and scenes being reproduced, streamlined to fit the tempo of the times? Are the colors of the play in which we are to take a part a little more modernistic, a little more refined, but nevertheless present? What does the great British author, Sidney Rogerson, mean when, visualizing the present European war, he said:

"We (England) shall require to do much propaganda to keep the United States benevolently neutral. To persuade her to take our part will be much more difficult. It will need a definite threat to America, a threat, moreover, which will have to be brought home by propaganda to every citizen, before the Republic will again take arms in an external quarrel."

What did this spokesman for the British thought mean when he said:

"Fortunately, with America our propaganda is on firm ground. We can be entirely sincere, as our main plank will be the old democratic one."

What did this eminent British author mean when he said:

"Our trouble here (in England) will be to find men with equally commanding reputations to step into the shoes of such men as Rudyard Kipling, Sir James Barrie, Bernard Shaw, John Galsworthy, and H. G. Wells."

Need we review the masterful efforts of the persons named, Rudyard Kipling, Sir James Barrie, Bernard Shaw, John Galsworthy, and H. G. Wells, by whose zeal and energy the torch of war was in 1917 lighted in the peace-loving souls of American millions?

We give no significance, but nevertheless we note, the press reports that Lord Alfred Duff-Cooper, former Lord Admiral of the British Fleet, who resigned at the time of the Munich incident, is now on a lecture tour of the United States. We are advised that Lord Morley, deputy leader of the House of Lords, is now visiting in America, and that the great British publicist, Lord Beaverbrook, has recently arrived on this side of the Atlantic. It has also been stated that English trade-union leaders were shortly to pay a visit to our country.

We are not unmindful of the statement of Lord Lothian, British Ambassador to the United States, made recently before the Pilgrim Society, in which, among other things, he said that England did not intend to propagandize the United States. That statement, however, was made by his lordship one day from that on which the British Minister of Information informed the British Parliament that full publicity would be given the Allied cause in the United States.

And we are not unmindful that the great author of the publication entitled "The Public Mind: Its Disorders and Exploitations" and many other texts on how to mold public opinion, Mr. Norman Angel, who rendered such valiant service by way of propaganda during the World War, is still virile and active.

Is the stage being set by dexterous hands and fertile minds who know the love that lingers in the American hearts for fair play and liberty? Have we not already had displayed to us by screen and pictorial and graphic account, atrocities wrought in the hell of war? Are hatreds being engendered in the minds of American citizens, where only impartiality should prevail, and where no other thought should be nurtured than an everlasting determination to keep this country aloof and at peace?

My fellow countrymen, I bring these thoughts to your attention for a purpose, and for one purpose only:

We must meet and combat, within our own borders and on our own soil and in our own homes, the instrumentalities of propaganda, instrumentalities that would cause us to form hatreds on one hand and favoritism on the other; instrumentalities coming to us in the most innocent form by agencies least suspected, which will centralize our individual as well as our mass prejudices, and cause us to forget the larger, more important thing; namely, to keep this country of ours away from the war fields of foreign conflicts.

I never want to see the American flag whipped by the breeze of a European battlefield.

Our cause and our course can be and must be the more glorious one of peace and power and leadership; an Army so manned and equipped as to be worthy of the dignity of the western world; a Navy worthy of carrying our flag on the waters of the world, secure and safe by reason of the potential power surrounding it. Our national integrity should be so demonstrated and foundationed that when we announce a policy we may repeat the expression of the great Grover Cleveland, when as President of the United States, in the Venezuela incident, speaking of the Monroe Doctrine, he said: "This fiat is law."

Couched in the wisdom of the ages, fortified by experiences, our forefathers formulated a government and molded into its foundation security for liberty and law alike. They declared that these cardinals of civilization could be maintained not by the power of the Army nor by the might of the Navy but by the coordinate support of an enlightened, progressive, patriotic people. The founders of our Government, as well as its faithful martyrs, established and determined on the constitutional system of checks and balances, thus transforming democracy from a dream to a reality; thus protecting the people against the tyranny of the individual or the oppression of the majority; thus placing civil and religious rights and liberties of both individual and group beyond the power of any party, however powerful; beyond impairment by any majority, however great; beyond Congress, however strong; beyond an Executive, however popular.

The founders of our Government made the people the reservoir of power, and fixed both the grant of power and the restraint of its exercise, in a written constitution, as the expression of the supreme wish of the people.

My fellow countrymen, we may have no fear for the success of this form of government, so long as the people, now sovereign in themselves, continue an untrammeled exercise of that sovereignty. Our fear, if any we should entertain, need not be based on the action of the people, but rather may we entertain apprehension lest perchance, listening to the rumble of a distant drum, and through misplaced sympathy, we permit foreign agencies to swerve us from our course. In my judgment, our danger lies not abroad. The threats to our form of government are more likely to come from unworthy agencies and undemocratic propaganda here in our very midst.

My fellow countrymen, the greatest enemies of our Republic may not be foreign foes, but rather domestic termites, who enjoy the spirit and atmosphere of our liberties, while at the same time they bore from within, to destroy the foundation of the very liberties they enjoy. While we concern ourselves to keep this country out of foreign wars, we must put on the shield and armor against domestic threats. Our form of government is good enough for those who love it, and those who do not see something in it to love had better find a place more congenial to their views.

We are not going to be led into a foreign war, and we are not going to permit foreign ideologies to tear down the structure that shelters us.

You men who served under your country's colors, let this twenty-first Armistice Day be dedicated to a firm resolve that democracy in America is the God-fearing spirit of freedom and progress. That regardless of what form of government other people may espouse, we are determined that the homes and hearts of those who give their allegiance to our Government shall be enshrined in the perpetuity of that Government, and that as a people, having gone through the fire of experience and the crucible of war, we announce to the world, here and now, that we are not going to be drawn into a European tragedy.

That the life of one American boy is worth more than all that can be gained by the war now raging abroad.

That we will give succor to the afflicted, and sympathy to those who experience the heartache of war, but we will so manage our national affairs as to guide our ship of state through these torn and troubled waters, so that when peace comes to the earth again, as it must come, bewildered people seeking leadership will see in the darkness about them the flame of our torch, held high by resolute hands, warriors of a former war, citizens of a great democracy, soldiers in the campaign for peace on earth and good will toward men.

I could not close with a more cogent thought than that which has been handed down in that sacred document coming from the heart and mind of the first President of the United States, and which to me is a sermon that should be repeated on every Armistice Day, from every pulpit, in every schoolroom, from the lips of every citizen of the land.

My brothers of the soldiery of yesterday, how prophetic were the words of Washington, when, in his farewell address to his country, he said:

"Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike of another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

"The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. * * *

"Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I shall occupy but a few moments, as I know the Senate is anxious to vote on the pending amendment.

I shall vote for the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN]. I have always supported tariff legislation based upon the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. I am satisfied that if we adopt the pending amendment, great numbers of persons now on the relief rolls will find employment in our mines, mills, shops, and factories.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as part of my remarks, an editorial from the New York Sun of April 2, 1940.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the Chair). Without objection, the editorial will be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the New York Sun of April 2, 1940]

FORTY-FOUR AGAINST THE FACTS

What are some important implications in the Senate's vote on March 29 on the Pittman amendment, which would have required the Senate to ratify the reciprocal-trade treaties?

Forty-four Senators voted against requiring Senate ratification. Therefore, they believe that the President should have power, delegated to the Secretary of State, to reduce any tariff duty as much as 50 percent. Forty-one Senators voted for requirement of Senate ratification, and so are opposed to such one-man power to destroy the American tariff, written in 1930 and passed by the entire Congress.

The 44 Senators who approve of the trade-treaty program must square their beliefs with these facts:

(1) The Hull trade-treaty program is not, as the Times asserts, "the most promising step that has been taken by any nation anywhere in recent years to rid world trade of destructive barriers." It has failed in that idealistic purpose, for today all Europe is erecting a complex structure of trade barriers to keep out the very products for which the gullible Mr. Hull obtained concessions in trade pacts now partly nullified by war commerce.

(2) The trade-treaty program was designed to admit to our markets heavier shipments of merchandise from abroad in the face of the Federal Wage and Hour Act, which applies to goods made or processed in American factories. While it is unlawful for a factory in one State to ship goods to another State if they were not made in full compliance with the new wage and hour regulations, it is quite legal for anybody to ship across State lines goods made abroad at much lower labor standards. This is a fantastic way to improve the standard of living of American labor.

(3) The Hull trade treaties have not caused a considerable increase in American export trade. On the contrary, two of the most important of all American exports—wheat and cotton—declined so much before the war began that our Government decided to subsidize their export. The first of the trade pacts with a most-favored-nation clause—the pact with Belgium—did not become effective until May 1935, yet by the end of 1934, without benefit of trade agreements, our exports had risen 33 percent in 2 years.

(4) The trade treaties do not make for peace. That is the most foolish of all the New Deal's arguments in favor of them. How did our pact with Czechoslovakia promote that nation's peace? The agreements have intensified the rivalry among all foreign countries for our rich market. Under war conditions the trade pacts are dangerous, for it is an era of unstable currencies and abnormal commerce. The Senate, without power to ratify these treaties, must sit by silently and watch the folly of the State Department.

(5) The administration's silly concern for its foreign-trade program in the midst of domestic distress has harmed the whole country. It would take nearly 20 years of exports as large as those of last year to equal 1 year of our domestic wholesale trade.

It is said that Secretary Hull's availability as a Presidential candidate depends on the continuance of his trade program by Congress. If that is true, his availability rested last week on the votes of three Senators.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I should like to say a word in behalf of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN].

I myself have offered a somewhat more elaborate amendment, which has the same purpose. The pending amendment seeks to insert in the joint resolution some standard which the executive department shall follow in determining what a tariff shall be. I do not see how the joint resolution can possibly be constitutional without some standard. We have seen flexible-tariff provisions enacted before. We saw the one which was included in the Hawley-Smoot Act; but all of them imposed on the executive department a specific standard—the difference in cost of production here and abroad. The standard imposed by this amendment is slightly different; but in view of the currency depreciation now occurring, I think the delivered cost is probably a better standard than the cost of production in some foreign country.

I do not understand how anyone can oppose the insertion in the joint resolution of a standard of protection. This is a very mild one, because it leaves entirely to the President's discretion the determination of the amount of duty necessary to protect American products against cheap foreign products—cheap because of low wages, cheap because of low costs of production. A milder statement could not be made. My own amendment provides that tariffs shall be referred to the Tariff Commission, that they shall have public hearings, that they shall then determine the difference in cost of production, and that any rate which is less than that required for protection of American products shall be eliminated.

I have seen a good many persons who are for free trade in theory, but today the theory of free trade seems to me impossible to carry out. The moment we permit the President to reduce the tariff below the difference in cost of production here and abroad, we encourage imports which replace American products; and those who vote to reject this amendment must be in favor of doing that.

I very strongly urge, therefore, that this amendment be adopted. I intend, for the purpose of the RECORD, to offer my own amendment after this amendment is disposed of, without asking for a record vote, in case this amendment is not adopted. If the joint resolution is to be constitutional, if we are to perform our constitutional duties by requiring the change of tariff duties to be based upon some standard, if we are to declare and let the Executive know that we intend to have him protect American industries, I cannot see what argument can be offered against the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN].

Mr. McCARRAN. On the amendment I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I have a pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], which I transfer to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HERRING], who, I am advised, if present and voting, would vote "nay"; and I vote "nay."

So Mr. MCCARRAN'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 2. That section 4 of the act entitled "An act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930," approved June 12, 1934, as extended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. Before the beginning of negotiations for any foreign trade agreement with any foreign government or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of this act, public hearings shall be held before such agency as the President may designate, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe. Notice of such hearings shall be published in the Federal Register, together with a detailed statement of the matters to be considered, not less than 20 days before such hearings are to commence. After such foreign trade agreement has been negotiated, it shall not be signed until it shall have been submitted to the United States Tariff Commission and such Commission shall have filed with the President a statement certifying that such foreign trade agreement will not reduce the rate of duty on any article which competes with any domestic article (where the domestic article is produced in the United States in an amount equal to 10 percent of the normal consumption in the United States) below an amount sufficient to equalize the difference between the cost of such articles produced in the principal competing country to which the tariff rate fixed in such foreign trade agreement would be directly applicable, or applicable through the operation of any most-favored-nation clause (which cost shall be the cost landed in an American port before the tariff is paid) and the cost of production in the United States of the competing domestic article. Before filing such statement with the President, the United States Tariff Commission shall hold open and public hearings and the text of such foreign trade agreement shall be published in the Federal Register at least 20 days before such hearings are to commence. The provisions (including definitions) of section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930 shall be applicable with respect to the performance by the Tariff Commission of its functions under this section, insofar as such provisions are not inapplicable or in conflict with the provisions of this section."

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, this amendment incorporates several provisions which have already been before the Senate for consideration. Briefly, it provides that before any treaty shall go into effect it shall be referred to the Tariff Commission, which shall hold public hearings, and no rate shall go into effect until the Tariff Commission has certified to the President that the rate is sufficient to equalize the difference between the cost of producion in this country and the delivered cost of the competing article coming in from abroad.

The amendment seems to me to contain the only conditions on which the reciprocal trade treaty policy can be worked out fairly, the only way in which it can be worked out with proper protection to American labor, with proper protection to American industry, with proper protection to the American agricultural producer and to the American miner.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, one of the primary objects in the negotiation of trade agreements is to equalize the difference between the costs of production in this country and abroad. The Tariff Commission is represented by one of its very best men on the Interdepartmental Committee which negotiates the agreements. Everything that could possibly be done under the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is now being done to ascertain the costs of production. The adoption of the amendment would conflict with the Senator's ideas of economy. If it was necessary for us to send to foreign countries in order to ascertain costs there, 5,000 accountants would be required, according to statements made in the hearings. Everything possible to ascertain the difference between the costs of production here and abroad is being done.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator says we are now doing this thing, and therefore we must not do it because it would be more expensive to do it. That statement does not seem to me to make sense. I do not understand the point of it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I can understand why it might not make sense to the Senator from Ohio, but the Senator must know that a tremendous additional cost would be added if we were obliged to send employees abroad to ascertain cost of production in every factory and field in all other countries. Naturally, the Senator must know the unreasonable delay that would result. We have adopted the means which is the most economical, but which is the soundest and most effectual, to ascertain the difference between costs here and abroad. We have found by experience that it is impossible to ascertain the cost-of-production basis in certain places in this country and in certain places abroad. I assure the Senator that in the hearings we were told that we were carrying out what the Senator has in view, in line with the objective he has in mind, with respect to ascertainment of costs.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, the Senator will admit that we should, therefore, impose a standard of protection. If a standard of protection should be imposed, the only way it can be imposed is for Congress to impose it. If we do not put the amendment in the legislation, we give unlimited power to the President of the United States to go ahead without any regard for a standard of protection.

The learned Senator from Mississippi says that standard is being imposed, but it is not because of anything in this law. Whether it is being imposed or not I do not know, I will say frankly. I should like to know. I should like to have some standard laid down which must be followed.

The producers of livestock say there is no such standard, and that the tariff has been reduced to a figure below the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. So do the producers of lumber; so do the producers of sugar; so do the producers of roller bearings in my State of Ohio; so do a great number of producers. We have never had a judicial determination to know whether those gentlemen are right or wrong.

If we want to have such a standard, if we admit the necessity for it, as the Senator from Mississippi does, then the only way the Senate of the United States can be assured that there is any such standard is to put the provision in the law where it belongs, and not leave the matter to the discretion of the Secretary of State, who believes in free trade, to go ahead and reduce the standard to any point that he thinks may possibly be protective of American industry.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he sits down?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. LEE. Does his amendment apply only in case a tariff is reduced below the difference in cost? It does not apply to a case involving increase of tariff, does it?

Mr. TAFT. No; it does not. It provides that the tariff rate shall be sufficient to protect the difference in cost. I would as lief put it the other way, but the amendment does not do so.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I shall vote for this amendment. I do not believe it would in any way hamstring the Department in adjusting the tariffs. In a case in northeast Oklahoma, persons interested in zinc asked the Department not to reduce the tariff. Some other Senators and myself asked the Department not to do anything about it without letting us know. They gave us the assurance they would not make any trade agreement with any other government without letting us know about it. Then one day, without any of us knowing about it, a trade agreement was announced with respect to zinc, whereby the tariff on zinc was reduced.

In connection therewith I wish to read the words of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, after hearing those interested in zinc testify. At page 449 of the hearings on the Extension of Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], made this statement:

> The CHAIRMAN. And have given you rehearings. To my mind, just from your testimony and what I know about this situation, I think that you have something to be aggrieved about. I think there was a mistake made in the Canadian agreement because it was not the chief competing country, and gave an advantage to Mexico, but I am advised that they are still considering this matter up there and they have asked the Tariff Commission to send in to your various zinc territories to make another investigation of this matter, and it is the hope of some of us that this matter will be straightened out.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that as a member of the committee I feel that those interested in zinc presented the strongest case of any presented to us. I felt so strongly about the matter that I called up the Secretary of State, and he told me that he had asked the Tariff Commission to make another investigation. I do not think there is any doubt that the situation which has resulted from the increased importation of zinc from Mexico will be cured.

Mr. LEE. I thank the Senator for that statement.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I think the Senator will agree in all fairness that, while it is undoubtedly true that the Republic of Mexico profited more than the Canadian Government by the reduction of the tariff on zinc—which presents a case under the escape clause of the Canadian agreement—nevertheless, is it not true that the zinc industry has actually not been hurt by the Canadian agreement, for the reason that the total importation of zinc is very considerably less than the increase in the domestic production of zinc, and the price of zinc is materially higher since the Canadian agreement went into effect?

I think it was a mistake to include zinc in the Canadian agreement. I think we have ground under the escape clause for taking it out. But, to be fair about the matter, at the present time, doubtless due to the outbreak of the war in Europe, it is a fact that the production of zinc in the United States has increased far more than all the importations of zinc, and that the price is materially higher than it was when the Canadian agreement was negotiated.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I agree with everything the Senator from Missouri says. The Senator incidentally will not mind my saying, I am sure, that he was one of the Senators who was given to understand that this agreement would not be closed at least until we were notified, and that we were not notified.

It so happens, as the Senator has said, that no doubt, due to the war, this situation is safe. In the case I referred to, however, at least three Senators, as I know, were promised that they were going to be given a chance to be heard before the door was closed, but the Senators were not given a chance. The door was closed. We went to appeal to the Department again and did appeal, and all we received was a nice reception.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am very glad the Senator made that last remark, because that is all any of us received—a nice reception.

The fact of the matter is that practically all the zinc mines of the West which go any particular depth below the surface, have been closed, by reason of the Canadian treaty, which gave all the zinc importation into this country to the Canadian Pacific Railroad Co., which controls the zinc industry of Canada. But under the Canadian treaty Mexico came in, and, of course, Mexico could put Canada out of business, because Mexico has a scale of wages entirely below even the Canadian scale. So Mexico could bring in her zinc to the United States to the destruction of our zinc-mining industry, and did do so.

I do not agree with the able Senator from Missouri. I realize what conditions are in Missouri with regard to zinc mining. They do not have to go to great depths in Missouri to obtain zinc.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, the essential thing I was pointing out, however, was that the price of zinc is a cent and a quarter to a cent and a half higher than it was before the Canadian agreement was entered into, and it will be very difficult for the Sentor from Nevada or anyone else to make it appear that an industry has been ruined the price of whose product has been substantially increased.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, we have become an exporter of zinc because of the war. Therefore, what the Senator says may be true. If we are going to base this entire legislation on war conditions, then let us say that it is based on war conditions. But we are basing the legislation on 6 years of experience, and we have had war conditions for less than 1 year of that period. The other 5 years were years of peace.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, the situation with reference to the zinc industry has been saved, fortunately, because of the increase in price, but if there had not been a war abroad the zinc industry might have been ruined, because immediately following the agreement, the price of zinc went off $5 a ton, and I believe 12 mines in the Miami district in Oklahoma were closed as a result thereof. Then the price started to rise.

Mr. President, as I have said, that is a fortunate situation. I am not supporting the amendment with the idea in mind of retaliation for the treatment we received in the case I cited, but with the idea that we should have some guaranty that there will not occur again such a situation that Senators or Representatives, or individual citizens are not heard, and their case not considered, as I believe it was not considered, on its merits, in this particular specific case.

Mr. McCARRAN. I may say to the able Senator—and his experience may be the same as mine—that the experience we had before the Board investigating the subject of zinc was identical to that which we had with respect to other subjects when we went to the Department. We were permitted to go there and make our statement and then walk away, without a single intimation of how they stood on the subject. Those were Members of the Congress of the United States, elected by sovereign States to speak for sovereign States and to speak for the people. They went down to speak for the people of their respective States, and they walked away without knowing what was going on. In other words, instead of the Congress holding this subject in its grasp, it has relinquished it, so that the Senator and I must go down and bend our knee to a group of subordinates in order to be heard.

Mr. LEE. I should say that was essentially my experience.

Mr. President, I do not wish in any way to hamstring the reciprocal trade agreement law. I think it is good. If I did not think it was good in the main I should not vote for it. I intend to vote for it. But, as I understand the pending amendment, it simply assures a hearing before there is an agreement on this subject, which seems to be fair.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The amendment provides that before the President shall even begin negotiations there shall be a public hearing. Then after he enters into an agreement, it must be submitted to the Tariff Commission, which must hold another hearing. Then the Tariff Commission must report to the President that the changes proposed will not reduce a tariff sufficiently to interfere with the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. So the amendment would require two hearings before the President would ever know whether or not he was making an agreement.

Mr. LEE. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT]. On that amendment the yeas and nays have been demanded and ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before concerning my pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lucas] and its transfer to the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], I will vote. I vote "yea." I am advised that the Senator from Illinois, if present, would vote "nay," and the Senator from Maine would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] who, I am informed, if present would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the following pairs on this question:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], who would vote "yea," with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY], who would vote "nay."

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN], who would vote "yea," with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMATHERS], who would vote "nay."

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], who would vote "yea," with the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], who would vote "nay."

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], the Senators from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS and Mr. SLATTERY], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMATHERS], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] are detained on important public business.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], are unavoidably detained.

The Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN]. I am advised that if present and voting, the Senator from California and the Senator from New Mexico would vote "yea," and that the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Missouri would vote "nay."

So Mr. TAFT's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I submit a unanimous-consent request that beginning at 1 o'clock tomorrow no Senator shall speak longer than 15 minutes or more than once on any amendment, substitute, or amendment to an amendment which may be offered. This does not include, of course, the time on the joint resolution. The request contemplates that we shall dispose of the amendments before we go to any further time on the joint resolution.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, we were unable to hear the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. The request for unanimous consent was that beginning at 1 o'clock tomorrow speeches be limited to one, and not more than 15 minutes, on any amendment, substitute, or amendment to an amendment. That does not limit the time on the joint resolution, but only on the amendments, so that we may dispose of them. I made no request with reference to a time for voting on the joint resolution.

Mr. McCARRAN. The only thing I wish to have understood is that I am not agreeing to any limitation of time on the joint resolution itself.

Mr. HARRISON. That is correct. I have made no such request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I wish to inquire, if an amendment is offered before 1 o'clock, whether or not the time on that amendment would be limited.

Mr. HARRISON. Let me say to the Senator that I understand that he desires to make a speech on the joint resolution, and that he is to have the floor tomorrow. I have not asked that the limitation apply before 1 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is it the understanding that I shall have the floor at 12 o'clock?

Mr. HARRISON. I had understood that the Senator was to obtain the floor this afternoon, and have it tomorrow when we convene.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Very well.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. MALONEY. I am anxious to ascertain whether or not there is really to be a limitation of time. As I understand the request, a Senator may speak as long as he desires on the joint resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; but not during the time when any amendment is pending. He is limited to 15 minutes on any amendment, substitute, or amendment to an amendment.

Mr. MALONEY. At the expiration of a 15-minute discussion on an amendment, would a Senator be permitted to take time on the joint resolution?

Mr. HARRISON. No.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator, if he will yield to me, that the proposed agreement would not preclude any Senator from discussing the joint resolution at length after the amendments are disposed of.

Mr. KING. That is all right.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator desires time to speak tomorrow morning, and wishes to defer until 1:30 the time at which the 15-minute limitation shall apply, I shall be glad to modify the request to that effect.

Mr. MALONEY. No; I do not care to do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, will the Chair state the request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi will again state his request.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that, beginning tomorrow at 1 o'clock p. m., each Senator may be recognized for 15 minutes on any amendment that may be offered or pending, or any substitute for or amendment to it, with no limitation as to the joint resolution itself, but that the limitation on amendments shall be 15 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I think I shall object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, can any modification be made of the request that will cause the Senator from Idaho to withdraw his objection?

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the consideration of this measure. I am just as anxious to have it passed as other Senators are, but the fact is that a number of amendments may be presented.

Mr. HARRISON. The proposed agreement only provides for a limitation of 15 minutes on any amendment. There is no limitation as to the number of amendments which may be offered.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. If I correctly understood the proposal—and I may not have done so—we shall then be permitted to discuss the joint resolution for any length of time we desire?

Mr. HARRISON. After the amendments have been disposed of.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I really cannot understand the advantage of doing a thing of this kind.

Mr. HARRISON. The only advantage of it is to make some progress and have a vote on the joint resolution at some time. If the Senator wishes to have the limitation begin at 1:30 or 2 o'clock, that will be all right.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I think I shall object.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Mississippi will yield, and if the Senator from Idaho will permit me, there is no effort to limit discussion on the joint resolution, and no time is fixed for a vote on the joint resolution. The suggestion offered by the Senator from Mississippi is intended to facilitate the consideration of amendments only. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that it is the desire of all of us to dispose of the joint resolution tomorrow, if possible, so that we may adjourn until Monday. I had contemplated asking the Senate to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow, instead of 12, which would give 2 hours before the agreement would go into effect. I hope the Senator from Idaho will not object to it.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Very well; I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement requested by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota will state it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is there any amendment pending at the desk?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is open to amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert, at the proper place in the joint resolution, a new section, to read as follows:

SEC. . No foreign trade agreement hereafter entered into under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, and no modification hereafter made in any such foreign trade agreement, shall provide for any decrease in the rate of duty applicable with respect to any agricultural product imported into the United States which is specified in paragraphs 701 to 783, inclusive, of schedule 7 of such act, as amended.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD obtained the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Minnesota does not desire to discuss his amendment this afternoon. Therefore it is my idea that the Senate should suspend now, with the understanding that the Senator from Minnesota retains the floor.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Florida that there is an amendment pending.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Florida desires to have the amendment read simply for the information of the Senate.

Mr. PEPPER. Yes; I wish to have it read merely for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Florida will be read for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. No foreign trade agreement hereafter entered into under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, no modification hereafter made in any such foreign trade agreement, and after the expiration of 240 days after the date of enactment of this joint resolution, no foreign trade agreement, and no modification of a foreign trade agreement, heretofore entered into under such section, shall provide for, or contain any provision which permits the importation into the United States in any one calendar year of any foreign agricultural or horticultural commodity which is in substantial competition with any like or similar domestic commodity, as determined by the United States Tariff Commission, at a rate of duty lower than that in effect with respect to such foreign commodity on June 12, 1934, after the quantity of the foreign commodity previously imported into the United States at such lower rate during such calendar year equals 125 percent of the total average annual quantity of such foreign commodity imported into the United States during the 5-year period from January 1, 1929, to January 1, 1934. As used in this section, the term "agricultural or horticultural commodity" includes any article which, on the date of enactment of this joint resolution, is classified as an agricultural import in the schedule of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, in the Department of Commerce, designated as "Schedule A, Statistical Classification of Imports Into the United States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Florida will lie on the table and be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Foreign Service of the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. On behalf of the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, who is now in the chair, I ask unanimous consent that the nominations in the Foreign Service be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters which had been favorably reported.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the nominations of postmasters which have been favorably reported be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

That completes the Calendar.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, APRIL 4, 1940

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Most merciful Father, who causeth the light to shine out of darkness and maketh the day to follow the night, we give Thee thanks and praise for Thy loving care which has brought us to the light of a new day. Grant that the light of faith, hope, and love shining within us may dispel all darkness. O Master of the hillside, stand in the midst of the throngs that crowd our city's streets that they may learn patience, contentment, and be led to follow where Thy feet have trod. Purify all hearts with noble passions and invigorate all wills with divine thoughts and aspirations. How prone we are, dear Lord, to shrink from difficulties and tremble at the dangers in our way. Deliver us from faint-heartedness and enable us to stand in the glorious liberty of those who fear nothing but to offend Thee. O blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity and in whose heart there is no guile. In our Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8641) entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, to provide supplemental appropriations for such fiscal year, and for other purposes"; and that it agrees to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 9 to said bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in the remarks I expect to make later in the day in the Committee of the Whole I may be permitted to include a statement by Edgar G. Brown, president of United Government Employees, Inc.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAYBURN). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, and include therein an address by Hon. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, of Massachusetts, on the occasion of the thirty-second annual banquet of the McKinley Association of Connecticut, at Hartford, Conn., on March 30, 1940.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHIFFLER asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday, April 9, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and following the legislative program of the day, I may be permitted to address the House for 25 minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask on what subject the gentleman from Pennsylvania expects to speak?

Mr. RICH. I hope to utilize that time in speaking about the Virgin Islands Co., a Government-owned corporation that manufactures rum and is selling rum to the people of this country. May I say also, Mr. Speaker, that this company is offering 500 cases of rum and giving away 200 cases free, contrary to the rules of good sound business for those who want to be in the rum business. Further, Mr. Speaker, this Government corporation, in which you are all stockholders and which is going in the red, is now giving away even what it is making.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I have a special order to address the House for 30 minutes at the conclusion of the legislative business today. I should like to cancel that, and I ask unanimous consent that a week from today, on April 11, after the legislative program of the day, I may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein certain excerpts from editorials, one or two brief editorials, and other excerpts taken from Government records, in connection with the establishment of the Inter-American Bank.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. POWERS] about how much time he believes will be required for general debate today on the Military Establishment appropriation bill, whether an hour or 2 hours?

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I have requests for almost 2 hours. May I ask how many requests the gentleman from Pennsylvania has?

Mr. SNYDER. I have requests for approximately 45 minutes at the present time.

Mr. POWERS. May I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we close general debate at 2:30 and that the gentleman allow me 2 hours out of that time. This will give the gentleman the entire 45 minutes which he has allotted. Is that satisfactory to the gentleman?

Mr. SNYDER. Suppose we make it not later than 3 o'clock.

Mr. POWERS. Not later than 3 o'clock is very satisfactory.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate today on the Military Establishment appropriation bill close at 3 o'clock this afternoon, at least 2 hours of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. POWERS] and the remainder to be controlled by me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9209) making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9209, with Mr. COOPER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I have requested this brief time in order to ask a question of the gentleman in charge of the bill, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SNYDER]. In all of our wars Negroes have made faithful and devoted soldiers. They have shown themselves to be courageous and in every way faithful to their country. The splendid record they have made in war should be a source of constant pride to the colored race. If they are to be exposed to the hazards of war, I believe they should have the training that would equip them to take care of themselves in war. That is elemental justice. May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for information, first, what provision is made for the training of Negroes as air pilots, and, secondly, are Negroes permitted to enlist in the Air Corps of the Army?

Mr. SNYDER. With reference to training, a working agreement has been entered into between the Army and the Civil Aeronautics Authority under which, I am advised, a rather large group of young Negroes is now being trained at a school on the outskirts of Chicago as pilots and aviation mechanics or engineers. This is taking place right now.

Mr. LUDLOW. It is under the Civil Aeronautics Authority?

Mr. SNYDER. The Army is cooperating with the Civil Aeronautics Authority in providing the training.

Mr. LUDLOW. What can the gentleman say as to whether or not Negroes are permitted to enlist in the Air Corps?

Mr. SNYDER. Negroes are enlisted in the Army, and there is no law that prohibits their assignment to the Air Corps. Whether or not any have been so assigned, I am not advised. But I want to say to the gentleman that I am satisfied we are making headway.

Mr. LUDLOW. I know the gentleman well enough to know that he wants to be entirely fair to the colored people.

Mr. SNYDER. Very much so; I share the gentleman's interest in this matter. If the gentleman will look over our hearings of this year and last, he will observe the committee's interest and pursuit of the question.

Mr. LUDLOW. I am very glad to have this assurance, and I thank the gentleman. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, one of the leading colored men of the United States, Edgar G. Brown, president of United Government Employees, Inc., made an interesting statement on this subject before the appropriations subcommittee. By unanimous consent of the House, I submit his statement for printing at this point in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF EDGAR G. BROWN, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES, INC.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman and members of the War Department Subcommittee on Appropriations, may I assure you of my deep sense of appreciation for the opportunity to appear before you and to outline briefly two matters of grave concern to our organization and the colored citizens throughout the country.

First, may I express the gratitude of those low-paid employees of the War Department who received consideration in the way of wage increases by the favorable action of your committee in the appropriations of last year. However, a number of faithful employees in this category with long records of service and satisfactory efficiency ratings, it has been stated to me, did not benefit along with the others.

These were messengers, I understand, most of whom not only never get a raise but even more rarely receive a promotion to a higher grade despite their qualifications. We are hopeful something may be specifically set aside and language in the report direct the proper officials to carry out the wishes of the committee and the Congress.

The matter of national defense is still a paramount matter to all Americans. As a representative of one-tenth of the total population, may I again respectfully call to your attention the progress of the preparedness program as it affects the colored citizens.

May I quote from the Pittsburgh Courier, one of our leading publications and the statement of the late Dean Kelly Miller, of Howard University:

Dean Miller wrote in the Cleveland Call and Post—

"During the four wars of our national history, the Negro, though sustaining aggravated grievances which would cause any other racial variety of our complex population to curse his country and die, has, amidst it all, remained loyal and true to the patriotic spirit of America. He has never been and, I predict, will never be on the wrong side of the patriotic equation. He has remained loyal to his country even though his country has not always been loyal to him. Like the Jew, he attached himself with the full measure of loyalty to the land and Nation in which he resides. Thus it has ever been, thus it is now, and thus may it forever be."

The essential statement there, of course, is that the Negro's loyalty is unquestionable, but, despite this fact, he does not get a fair opportunity to serve. While he does not get that opportunity, he is still willing and anxious to fight for his country.

Mr. SNYDER. I think all of us realize that.

Mr. BROWN. May I, again, cite the provisions of Public Law No. 18, passed by the Seventy-sixth Congress, from which I read as follows:

"The Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his discretion and under rules, regulations, and limitations to be prescribed by him to lend to accredited civil aviation schools, one or more of which shall be designated by the Civil Aeronautics Authority for the training of any Negro air pilot, at which personnel of the Military Establishment are pursuing a course of education and training pursuant to detail thereto under competent orders of the War Department, out of aircraft, aircraft parts, aeronautical equipment and accessories for the Air Corps, on hand and belonging to the Government, such articles as may appear to be required for instruction, training, and maintenance purposes."

The War Department has endeavored to carry out the letter of this law, but with certain definite reservations.

I have here a letter from Glenn E. Scott, 516 Fifty-fourth Street, Fairfield, Ala., dated January 31, 1940, as follows:

"I have your communication of December 12 concerning my entering United States Army Air Corps. You suggested that I write directly to the War Department there in Washington and make application.

"I communicated with the War Department recently, and The Adjutant General said, since there are no colored Air Corps units in the Army to which colored graduates are to be assigned, application from colored persons for flying-cadet appointments for enlistment in the Air Corps are not being accepted, so, if you have any helpful suggestions or can help me in any way, I will be glad to hear from you and thanks a lot."

All Negro citizens are denied an opportunity to enlist in the United States Army Air Corps as pilots or mechanics.

Your chairman and members of the committee have been most interested in this whole matter as reflected in the hearings of last year, which includes the statements of those of us who appeared and the Secretary of War. Some letters in my possession, I think, too, should have the attention of the Congress. The demonstration unit in Chicago, under the C. A. A., has received some valuable assistance from the War Department, but Negroes do not receive equal opportunities. I have a number of letters, one or two from Negroes who have been examined for service in the Air Corps. They have been examined by the United States Army Air Corps officials and have passed all the physical tests.

They are desirous of serving the Government in the Air Corps, but they still receive letters like the one I have just read to the committee. That is true despite other information that is given out from time to time from different places that they can serve in the Air Corps. The truth is, no Negroes have ever been admitted to the United States Army Air Corps.

The Civil Aeronautitcs Authority has complied with the law by designating one of the nine schools that the War Department is using for the training of young flying cadets in the emergency program to provide instruction for Negroes. This school that the Civil Aeronautics Authority has designated is the Chicago Aeronautics School, Glenview, Ill. There is no objection on the part of the officials, and they have the facilities out there. They pay $75 per month for every man taking the course, but board and lodging is not provided for Negroes. They are not getting as many cadets for training as they want. I see a number of advertisements on the streetcars calling for enlistments, but Negroes who request aviation training are unable to get in the Air Corps.

Mr. SNYDER. That school is at Chicago, is it not?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir. They are not admitted at any of the other eight schools. That ninth school, in keeping with the law, has been designated by the Civil Aeronautics Authority for the training of Negro pilots. The C. A. A. has carried out the law with respect to the training of Negro pilots as far as they are concerned. The War Department has loaned the necessary equipment, but still Negroes are not enlisted in the United States Army Air Corps. The Civil Aeronautics Authority has designated six colleges, specifically, where Negroes may receive this training, namely, Howard University, Tuskegee Institute, Delaware State College, Hampton Institute, the North Carolina A. and T. College, and the West Virginia State College. In Chicago the C. A. A. has set up a school for noncollege Negroes. Negroes have shown aptitude along these lines, and they are going in for the instruction. A Negro student at Minnesota University was the first in the class to solo. Many of these Negro youths desire to go into the United States Army, and they want to enlist in the Air Corps. They are patriotic representatives of one-tenth of the population; they want to do their part for the national defense. They want to have the opportunity to do that, just as Congress has voted in measures that the President has signed. They want to serve in the way that is authorized under the statutes of the United States Government.

I have here a letter from a Negro Medical Reserve officer, Dr. D. Vincent Estill, who resides at South Boston, Va. This letter includes a list of a large number of Negroes who have passed the physical examination, and whose completed application blanks have been mailed to the Regular Army recruiting station. These young Negro men have passed the examination and want to go in the Army, but they cannot get in any place, I am told, either as cavalrymen, infantrymen, or in any other branch of the service. These boys want to be ready to fight for their country; they want to enlist in the military service and to discharge their full obligation to the Government. This doctor is himself greatly interested; he has examined them. He has done everything to comply with the circulars sent out to the Reserve officers. Still, nothing is done about it.

The administration has been cutting down on expenditures. The Appropriations Committee, particularly, has been doing that with a view to effecting economies. The President has expressed himself on that point, advocating economy, and the Congress has been making substantial reductions in the estimates. The House of Representatives has taken the leadership. Still, with the additional money provided for the national defense, these Negroes, who were formerly under some other phase of the program designed to take care of the unemployed, are turned back from the Army, as they are dropped from other rolls. They want to go into the Army, and it does not seem fair that these American citizens of color should not be given a single opportunity to serve, denied employment, and every means of making a livelihood by the Government. As I have said, they want to go into the Army, and the Army is advertising all the time for enlistments. Despite that, these men cannot enlist. We feel that the Appropriations Committee and the Congress should know about this condition, so they can make some further amendment of the law to cover it. That could our humble judgment, in view of the fact

I have statements from the National Asso
ment of Colored People in regard to the enti are using the manpower of the country as the threat that comes from both sides of t who love our country, think very strongly v these people who want to fight, and who can fight. You do not have to worry about subversive activities on the part of Negroes.

I have here another statement by Kelly and have portrayed to them in some detail the efforts that are being made by the Congress in behalf of learning and culture.

The event to which I refer is the removal of the world-famous Army Medical Library to Capitol Hill, for which the War Department appropriation carries an item of $130,000 for plans of a building to house this library. The inadequacy of the present structure on the Mall next to the Smithsonian Institution is well known. For some years the safety and preservation of the Medical Library has demanded its removal to a more appropriate building, but the question has been whether it should be located with the Army Medical Center at the present site of the Walter Reed Hospital, or whether it should remain within the city where it would be more easily accessible to medical scholarship, both in and outside of Washington.

Mr. HARTER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I gladly yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HARTER of Ohio. This library comprises one of the greatest collections of medical books in the entire world, does it not?

Mr. COLLINS. It is the outstanding collection of medical literature.

Mr. HARTER of Ohio. And it is in grave danger of destruction if it is continued in its present antiquated building?

Mr. COLLINS. That is exactly the truth.

Mr. KERR. Over 1,700,000 people made use of the material in the Library of Congress during the last calendar year.

Mr. COLLINS. I thank the gentleman for that information.

The hearings on this point have been very illuminating, and I hope every Member will read what the most eminent men in the field of medicine and surgery have said with reference to the Army Medical Library and its value to the medical profession. The committee has had no hesitation in accepting the recommendation of these leaders in medicine that the library be located on this Hill near the Library of Congress.

In coming to this conclusion the committee has considered not only the accessibility and safety of the Army Medical Library but also the benefit of its proximity to the Library of Congress. The addition of the Army Medical Library to this growing library center will make Capitol Hill the most important educational center in this hemisphere, if not in the world.

Consider, if you please, the progress that has been made toward that desideratum. In 1896 the Library of Congress, comprising then about 1,000,000 books and pamphlets, besides large collections of manuscripts, maps, and prints, was moved to the new building across the esplanade. Within the past decade three beautiful marble buildings have been erected on streets adjoining the Library of Congress square, namely, the Supreme Court Building, the Folger Shakespeare Library, and the Library of Congress Annex, all of which are dedicated wholly or in part to library purposes.

The Library of Congress, with its two fine examples of library architecture, and with collections now comprising more than 6,000,000 books and pamphlets, is unquestionably one of our people's greatest glories. As Members of this body which has encouraged its development and used it constantly, we have a right to be proud of the Library we have created for the Nation. We are all familiar with some of its treasures, and in the annual reports of the Librarian we have read descriptions of its great collections.

We are aware of the fact that in point of numbers—more than 6,000,000 volumes—it is the largest library in the world; that it possesses the greatest collection of manuscripts on American history in the United States, too numerous to be counted; the largest collection of maps, 1,421,285; the largest collection of music in the United States, 1,221,333 volumes and pieces; the largest collection of prints, 548,622; at least 100,000 rare and costly volumes; the largest Chinese library outside of China and Japan; and the largest Russian library outside of Russia. In truth, it may be said that the Library of Congress is not merely a library but rather an aggregation of libraries. A very conservative value of $75,000,000 was recently assigned to it in the report of the legislative branch appropriations bill of 1941, but I regard this estimate as absurd. Scholars know that it would take over $300,000,000 to replace it when one considers the cost of a large and experienced staff which has been required to develop the Library.

Impressive as these figures may sound, one cannot help but wonder why certain collections and subjects have been singled out while others have not been developed. It is doubtless true that the Library of Congress is the largest single library in the world, and certainly the most modern, but we must remember that we have only one national library, whereas Great Britain, Germany, Italy, and Russia have several, and each one of them possesses many more rare books and old manuscripts than does the Library of Congress. A land as extensive and as rich as the United States should not be satisfied with one national library. Three years ago I introduced a bill to establish at a cost of not over $50,000,000 five regional libraries, branches of the Library of Congress, to be located at appropriate points of the country. At approximately one-half of the cost of a modern battleship we could possess a national library system far more commensurate with the needs and the wealth of the United States than a single library of only 6,000,000 volumes.

Would it not be fairer to judge our Nation's cultural treasures by what we have not rather than by what we possess? How does it happen that our Library of Congress excels in Russian and Chinese literature, but does not excel in French, German, Italian, Dutch, Polish, Finnish, Turkish, Arabic, Indic, and all of the other great occidental and oriental literatures?

It is a satisfaction to know that our Library possesses the most voluminous collection of music, but what I should like to know is where do we stand in the other esthetics? If we do not have surpassing collections in these and other fields of the humanities, in the social sciences, and in pure science, we deserve not the tribute of the Master Builder, "Well done, good and faithful servant," for we have hidden our talents in a napkin.

In the centennial celebration in 1936 of the Army Medical Library, its able librarian, Maj. Edgar Erskine Hume, declared in an article printed in the Military Surgeon that—

> In America we have before us for comparison the development of the two largest professional libraries in the country, those of law and of medicine. The Law Library of Congress was established in 1832, the act of Congress requiring this collection to be maintained as a separate unit in an apartment near the Library of Congress. The collection has been housed in various places, at present being in one of the wings of the Library of Congress Building. The law library has frequently been neglected, for it has had but little money spent on it, its growth being largely due to copyright, transfers from other Government libraries, and international exchange. Several law libraries in the United States are superior to the Law Library of Congress in some fields, while the Harvard law library is far larger and superior in every way, containing 435,000 volumes, while the Law Library of Congress contains 275,000 (the totals are those of 1933). Contrast this with the growth of the Army Medical Library, which in 20 years passed the medical collections of the two largest general libraries in Europe as well as those in America.

Major Hume continues:

> The law librarian of Congress in 1933 wrote: "Undoubtedly, had the law library been independent from its foundation in 1832, the Government would have possessed the best law library in the world today, instead of it lagging behind, with many serious gaps in the collection." Yet the Law Library of Congress was established several years before the Army Medical Library. In a circular letter sent out to prospective members of the Friends of the Law Library of Congress, it was proposed to "crystallize sentiment throughout the country to the end that the national law library may obtain all the resources necessary to meet the demand made upon it, and become as eminent in law as the Surgeon General's Library in Washington is in medicine."

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. LEAVY. The gentleman is making a splendid address, and I am pleased that he has developed the fact that the law library is not and has not been receiving that degree of recognition it deserves. We are all proud of the fine medical library and our general library and would take nothing from them, but the statements just made are proof of the fact that much greater consideration must be given the law library, and it should be the greatest and finest in the world, not second to any, as it now is. Recently Congress has shown a greater interest in the law library, but we have still a long way to go to make this department what it should be. The United States Government should not have a second-rate law library.

Mr. COLLINS. I agree heartily with what the gentleman says and thank him for his contribution. Unquestionably our law library should be second to none. It was neglected for too many years.

Mr. Chairman, we have a great library, but it should be far richer and more voluminous. If it were as complete as the Army Medical Library, which I shall describe in more detail later on, it should now possess approximately 30,000,000 volumes, and we should have constructed three or four library buildings at this seat of learning instead of two.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a remark?

Mr. COLLINS. I gladly yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. PLUMLEY. I take this occasion to agree with what the gentleman has to say with respect to the Library of Congress, and in that connection may I suggest that Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont, long time a distinguished Representative and Senator, may well be known as the father of the real Library of Congress idea, and his dreams and his ideals are just now beginning to be realized.

It is not generally known that for many years the so-called Library of Congress was kept in the west front of the Capitol. Some 350,000 volumes taxed the facilities and made the quarters inadequate. Hundreds of thousands of books and engravings were stored in inaccessible places in the basement. The real usefulnes of the Library was nil. Representative Justin S. Morrill appreciated all this—a student and book lover, he interested himself in the situation. As a Member of the House he was recognized for his instinctive leanings toward art and literature. May I suggest that when one undertakes to visualize the bare, Spartanlike simplicity of life in a frontier village of Vermont a century and half ago, one must be intrigued by the aspirations that prompted and motivated him.

His service in the House justified his selection for a place on the Senate Committee on Buildings and Grounds, of which he finally became the chairman.

He opposed formidably all plans to make over the Capitol in order to provide space therein for the Library of Congress.

At last he saw his dream come true, but it took patience and tact and political skill to bring his dream to fruition. The Library of Congress became his pet, and it is acknowledged that but for his persuasiveness, tenacity, and, incidentally, his place as chairman of the Finance Committee, the vast sums required could not have been had with which to erect the magnificent building placed where he had desired and worked to see it—on the plaza facing the front of the Capitol.

To Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont, chiefly is due the credit for the Library of Congress as it stands today. I felt that this should be made a matter of record at this time and as a part of this valuable contribution which the gentleman is making.

I hope the vision of the speaker with respect to the Library of Congress, its growth, and usefulness may also be realized.

Mr. COLLINS. I thank the gentleman very much for his historical contribution.

When I recall the many opportunities which this rich Nation has had to acquire distinguished and rare collections, both abroad as well as in this country, I often marvel at the myopic vision of some of our statesmen and librarians.

We may well be proud of the possession of the original Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, but our pride is somewhat dampened when we recall that the original autographed manuscript of the Farewell Address of Washington was offered to the Congress before it was purchased by James Lenox for $2,200. Of this historic purchase Henry Stevens says in his Recollections of Mr. James Lenox:

> Mr. Lenox bought it against the Congress Library for $2,200, I think, while some blamed him for competing against Government Library, where such a national relic ought to find a resting place. He, however, offered the Library Committee not to compete under their limit, if they would tell him how far they intended to go. They declined to tell him their limit, or even if they intended to buy it, so he very properly disregarded them. There is probably no class of appointed men so often called upon to decide without experience as Library Committees, whose chief delight seems to be to sit on Librarians disposed to independent decisions.

The surviving volumes of the library of Jefferson are viewed with pride by every Member who visits the rare-book room of the Library of Congress, but what can one say of a Library Committee which failed to purchase the private library of Washington, comprising 3,000 volumes, which in order to prevent its being sold in Europe was purchased by private subscription at a price of $3,250 from Henry Stevens and presented to the Boston Atheneum?

In 1836, when the Library of Congress comprised approximately 25,000 volumes, it had the opportunity to purchase the library of the lately deceased Count de Boutourlin, of Florence, Italy. This library, consisting of 25,000 volumes, had cost the collector, one of the most renowned bibliophilists of Europe, upward of $250,000. It contained a complete collection of the Italian classics, a full collection of the Latin and Greek classics, 419 copies of the Aldine editions, 368 from the Bodoni Press, many hundred volumes printed in the fifteenth century, and among other illustrative of the early achievements of typography and its progress to perfection, upward of 240 manuscripts, some of them unique and most of them scarce and curious. This grand collection, which would have doubled the size and quintupled the value of the Library of Congress, could have been purchased at a cost of from $50,000 to $60,000. Sad to relate, a resolution offered by the chairman of the Library Committee, Mr. Preston, to purchase this valuable library was tabled upon the motion of Henry Clay, the same statesman who had urged the purchase of the manuscript of Washington's Farewell Address.

A similar fate befell the offer of the Durazzo library in 1842, which comprised 10,500 volumes of folio and quarto, having been in process of collection for several hundred years by the illustrious old Durazzo family of Genoa. This collection, which was extensive in history, law, jurisprudence, diplomacy, and the classics, was offered for $30,000, less than the cost of the binding. It was objected by the Joint Committee on the Library that the collection did not contain the investigations of scholars of the modern school of historical and literary criticism.

One of the greatest losses resulted through the failure of Congress to purchase the library of George Bancroft, which consisted of 14,606 volumes of printed books, 480 volumes of manuscripts, and 4,648 pamplets.

The foregoing notable examples are not uncommon in the history of the Library of Congress. Many similar collections of American and European ownership could have been purchased within the past quarter of a century at relatively moderate cost, and some of them would doubtless now be housed in these marvelous storehouses on Capitol Hill, where they would be used instead of reposing in some private or cloistered university library. I refer particularly to the Benedict collection of American colonial law, the Hartley papers, the Garcia and Icazbalceta collections purchased by the University of Texas, the George Dunn collection of early English yearbooks, statutes, and treatises, the Stolberg-Wernigerode Castle library, the Robino collection of Slavonic material, a collection of the official newspapers of the State of Venice from 1800 to 1860, the Herschell Jones collection, and many other notable collections.

In several instances, however, the Congress has laid politics aside and has made handsome provision for its library. The appropriation of $100,000 for the purchase of the Peter Force collection in 1867, when the Treasury had been depleted by the Civil War, was nothing short of real statesmanship. All honor to the Congress and the newly appointed Librarian, Ainsworth Rand Spofford, who sponsored it.

I trust I may be pardoned for referring to an appropriation with which I had a humble part, namely, the bill authorizing the purchase of the collection of 3,000 incunabula, including the perfect copy of the Gutenberg Bible on vellum, which now rests in its handsome mahogany case in the exhibition hall of the old Library Building. According to scholars, this is unquestionably the greatest single acquisition in the history of the Library, at one step raised the institution from a rather utilitarian library to one of great distinction. To that notable acquisition in the history of the Library there was even influential opposition which was difficult to persuade. The late Senator Fess, of Ohio, chairman of the Joint Committee on the Library, in a speech on the Library of Congress, delivered in the Senate on February 10, 1933, said:

> I opposed it as the chairman of the Committee on the Library in the Senate, and the chairman on the Library in the House approved it. The Librarian of Congress thought we probably were going too far. Yet when the collection was presented here before the Senate and the House the only note against it was on the part of the persons I have mentioned. Both the Senate and the House overwhelmed us and demanded that we buy it, although it cost over a million dollars.

A description of the Library of Congress would be incomplete without a word as to the generous donations of money, books, and musical instruments that have been bestowed upon that institution due to the initiative of the former Librarian, Herbert Putnam. The Congress, fortunately, has retained his services in that important work as Librarian Emeritus, and it is hoped he may continue at his post for many years.

His successor, the present Librarian of Congress, Archibald MacLeish, with his poetic imagination, already shares the dream of us all to make Capitol Hill the greatest educational and cultural center in the world, and with his proven ability as an administrator will aid it with all of the power of his voice and facile pen.

No program of enlarging the Library of Congress would be complete that did not include the transfer to this intellectual center of many of the rare and valuable books and documents now deposited in departmental and bureau libraries. This is imperative for their preservation.

THE FOLGER SHAKESPEARE LIBRARY

It was the vision of a Maecenas who foresaw the development of an intellectual center on Capitol Hill and accelerated its realization. For 30 years Henry Clay Folger combed the book marts of Europe and America in quest of books relating to Shakespeare and his times. During this period, with the help of his faithful wife, Emily, he searched book catalogs patiently and unceasingly in their mutual endeavor to assemble the finest collection of Elizabethan literature in the world. The Bard of Avon has had his friends and his detractors, but I venture to assert that he never had a greater admirer in all history than Henry Folger. When he had finally gathered a library of about 80,000 volumes, which was too large for his private home, he decided to dedicate it to the public. It had cost him the sum of $200,000 a year for 30 years, a total of $6,000,000. Classmates of Amherst College urged him to devote the library to his alma mater, but he had other plans. Mr. Folger wanted it placed where it would be accessible to American scholars generally and not to have it sequestered within the confines of a college town. Accordingly he quietly purchased a row of houses known as Grant Row, facing upon East Capitol Street, and there decided to erect an appropriate building to enclose his wonderful treasures.

It was at that time that the Congress had authorized the purchase of the entire block to the back of the Library for the location of the annex. When Mr. Folger's great project became known, the Congress willingly yielded the one-quarter of the square he had already purchased and changed its plans for the annex accordingly.

Unfortunately, this great patron of letters could not live to see his library building completed, for he went to "that unknown land from whose bourn no traveler returns" only 2 weeks after the cornerstone was laid in 1930. The loss of his guiding hand in bringing his work to completion is greatly to be regretted. However, with that liberality and vision that ruled his life, he left his fortune to be used in its completion and maintenance, and his distinguished and capable widow carried on, as he would have desired, until she went to join him in 1936.

The Folger Shakespeare Library is one of the most impressive and interesting buildings erected in recent years on Capitol Hill. There are few buildings in the city of Washington—or perhaps in any city here or abroad—which surpass or even equal it in its architectural beauty, choice location, and dignified setting.

Of course, the principal function of the library is to facilitate study by literary scholars, and the principal room, therefore, is the reading room. It is modeled after the high-roofed banqueting hall of a great Elizabethan mansion, with a high trussed roof, and lighted by three bay windows. It is 38 feet wide, 131 feet long, and 32 feet high. There are two tiers of shelves, and the room is supplied with electrical book lifts. For the most valuable material there are two large vaults accommodating 18,000 volumes, and two smaller vaults, all opening on the reading-room floor. At the west end of the reading room, upon the special request of the founder, there has been installed a reproduction of the apse window of Trinity Church at Stratford-on-Avon. The magnificent stained-glass window which has been designed by Nicola d'Ascenzo, depicts the Seven Ages of Man from As You Like It.

The books of the library approach the stately number of 105,000 volumes. In addition to these there are about 37,000 manuscripts, 250,000 playbills, and 38,000 prints. In the first place, there are the works of the great bard himself. The library owns the first editions of all the poems. Of the quartos, the early pamphlet editions of the individual plays, the library possesses an almost complete collection. Perhaps one of the most interesting of these items is the unique copy of the first edition of a play of Shakespeare ever printed, the 1594 edition of Titus Andronicus. For more than two centuries this pamphlet had disappeared and doubt was even expressed as to whether the edition had ever been published. Then finally, in 1904, it was discovered in Sweden and shortly afterward it was acquired by Mr. Folger, who had become aware of its existence through the public press.

Another of the Folger Library's highly valued possessions is the collection of copies of the First Folio. A few years after Shakespeare's death some of his fellow actors decided to publish his collected dramatic works in a memorial volume. This book, which is entitled "Mr. William Shakespeare's Comedies, Histories, Tragedies Published According to the True Originall Copies," may be regarded as one of the most important literary publications in the English language. It contains 36 plays of Shakespeare—all except Pericles. Nineteen of these plays appeared in this book for the first time. Today the Folger Library has 79 copies of the First Folio of Shakespeare. The question may be asked, "Why did Mr. Folger desire to gather together 79 relatively complete copies of the first collected edition of Shakespeare's works, together with enough fragments to make three or four more copies?" It may be answered that these copies were not collected because of a misguided hoarding instinct. Dr. Edwin E. Willoughby, the chief bibliographer of the library, in an article, observes that:

> So that by a careful comparison of each copy they may provide material for the final establishment of the text of Shakespeare. As the sheets of the First Folio were being printed errors were sometimes found and corrected. * * * Only by carefully comparing many copies with each other, discovering where they vary, and determining the reason for each variation, can the final text of Shakespeare be established. And to provide the materials for this undertaking Mr. Folger made this unequaled collection of First Folios.

Thus we have here within one building in this National Capital of our's over one-third of the extant copies of a book which is one of the most desirable and one of the most expensive items on the lists of book collectors throughout the world. It will be observed that the Folger Library's closest rival is the British Museum; it possesses five copies.

Moreover, the library also has numerous copies of the Second, Third, and Fourth Folios. Of the published editions from the Rowe of 1709 down to the present it has all the important publications.

Of the priceless collections of the Folger Shakespeare Library 12,000 books in English were printed before the year 1640. Furthermore, the library has both original editions and the modern edited works of every important writer contemporary with Shakespeare. It possesses nearly every important commentary, biography, or study on Shakespeare or his times. It may be said, without overstating the fact that the entire English Renaissance period in literature, social life and history is covered by the books in the Folger Library.

The library contains also some unique relics of Shakespeare, including, just to name a few, an impression of the seal of Shakespeare's father; a copy of the Black Friars' deed signed by Walker and held by Shakespeare—the only relic outside of England of which we can be absolutely certain Shakespeare owned and handled; a document signed by Shakespeare's fellow actor, John Heminge, carrying out the instructions of his will; furniture from the birthplace and from Anne Hathaway's cottage; and several attributed signatures of the great bard, two of which are believed to be genuine.

Among other pertinent possessions of the library are letters, papers, and books of Queen Elizabeth, documents and books of Francis Bacon; also furniture from the palace of the great queen; and one relic of which it has been said that it receives more publicity than it deserves, that is, Queen Elizabeth's corsets.

Since 1931 the Folger Shakespeare Library has been under the direction of one of the foremost Shakespearian scholars, Dr. Joseph Quincy Adams. Owing to the foresight and alertness of this eminent authority and the board of trustees of Amherst College, another important and most valuable collection of early English literature known as the "Harmsworth Collection" has been acquired by the library. The addition of this collection has generally been regarded to be of the utmost importance to American scholarship; and a number of the acquired items have been minutely described in scholarly publications.

Of course, the principal reason for buying these books was for the widening of scholarship; but a number of them also deserve attention for other reasons. Among these rare items we find a beautiful book, of which only one other perfect copy is known; it is Antoine de la Sale's Fyftene Ioyes of Maryage, which was printed by Wynkyn de Worde in 1509 and bound shortly after; but it is still in the original calf binding blind stamped with figures of Saint Katherina of Greece. Many of the Harmsworth books may be said to call history to life. One thick squat tome of tracts by Bishop John Woolton formerly stood on the bookshelves of Queen Elizabeth. Another royal book once belonged to King James; it is Capt. John Smith's Generall Historie of Virginia, New-England, and the Summer Isles, printed in 1624. This book is rendered even more precious by the fact that an early owner has entered opposite the names of the adventurers the amounts of their respective investments.

Recently, while visiting Lady Annie Harmsworth at the seat of the Harmsworth family, Dr. Adams, exploring a rambling old Elizabethan barn of many rooms, came upon a locked, windowless, and unlighted room, in which had been stored the purchases made by Sir Leicester Harmsworth during the last months of his life, many in unopened packages as received. The existence of these books was unknown even to the members of the family; yet here were more than 450 items printed before 1640 which would make a valuable addition to the collection of early English books which has just been mentioned above. Lady Harmsworth asked Dr. Adams to make in writing an offer for the books which she might refer to the Harmsworth trustees with her recommendation. The offer was promptly accepted, and these latest additions to the Harmsworth collection have now taken their destined place in the Folger Library.

Beautifully housed in the building designed by Mr. Cret, this great collection of Shakespeariana awaits the scholars of future generations as well as those of our own. In concluding my brief description of the contents of this veritable treasure house let me quote the words of Emerson which were chosen by Mr. Folger—just another of our public spirited citizens—to be carved over the great fireplace in the reading room:

> England's genius filled all measure
> Of heart and soul, of strength and pleasure,
> Gave to the mind its emperor,
> And life was larger than before;
> Nor sequent centuries could hit
> Orbit and sum of Shakespeare's wit.
> The men who lived with him became > Poets, for the air was fame.

THE ARMY MEDICAL LIBRARY

On November 16, 1936, the Army Medical Library held its centenary. In this one century has been developed the largest and most significant medical library in the world. It was in 1836, during the second term of Andrew Jackson, that Surgeon General Lovell began to form a small collection of books, The Library of the Surgeon General's Office, which by 1840 included only 128 volumes. From these humble beginnings, with this as a nucleus, has grown the greatest specialized library in the world, an institution of which every American can feel proud, known, honored throughout the world, not only for wealth of its holdings but for the wonderful apparatus with which it has implemented them and made them the most accessible and available sources of any department of human knowledge in the world today. We refer specifically to the Index Catalogue and Index Medicus. The British Museum regards this catalogue as the greatest ever achieved, and it is the first subject catalogue worthy of the name. Its appearance marked an epoch in the development and improvement of medical literature, and there is nothing that approximates it in any field of knowledge. To find what has been written on a specific subject it is only necessary to look in the alphabetically arranged catalog which by the issue of new series is kept up to date. A few years ago an elderly Norwegian woman had a recurrence of an abdominal growth that had been removed in Norway years before, by a very delicate operation, the surgeon employing a novel technique. A report embodying the details was published in a Norwegian medical journal at the time. When the surgeon consulted in this case was loath to operate and the elderly lady insisted that she would take all risks if the operation was in accordance with the method of her former surgeon who had died in the meanwhile. The physician's interest was aroused, and he asked that they write to her old home for the report. They wrote to a friend in Washington to do this for them, giving him the date, and name of the doctor. He, however, on advice, went to the Surgeon General's library with the data. There they readily located the report, loaned him the volume of the journal containing it. Thereupon he took it to the Library of Congress where Mr. Earl McSherry Hyde, the best philologist and research scholar I know, translated it from the Norwegian. The operation, following the mode of incision outlined, was successful.

This concrete case is merely adduced to show how this great institution—scholarly, modest, and dignified, but never aloof and always aggressive—is thus the watchdog of the people's health by providing ready reference material for the busy physician or the research student. The library now receives about 2,000 medical journals, and indexes every worth-while article in every issue of every journal of almost every country and in almost every civilized language, and indexes not just by title but by every subject discussed therein. The catalog also enjoys the distinction of being the most accurate bibliographic work ever produced.

Emerson has said that every institution is the lengthened shadow of some great man. It was the vision of Dr. John Shaw Billings that made the Army Medical Library, and in the Emersonian sense it is his lengthened shadow. "Books," said he, "are properly compared to tools of which the index is the handle"; and Osler has testified to how worn and bethumbed are the volumes of the Index Catalogue in the foreign libraries showing how much the world appreciates these tools. This country is proud of its Crawford Long and others that made anesthesia possible; proud of Ephraim McDowell, its pioneer in ovaritomy; of Walter Reed and his discovery of insect transmission of disease; proud that we have been foremost in the development of the modern public-health laboratory; but in an appraisement of our contribution to medicine the decision of leading authorities is in accord with the words of Dr. Welch:

I question whether America has made any larger contribution to medicine than in building up and developing the Surgeon General's library and in the publication of the Index Catalogue and the Index Medicus.

In 1926 a change in the form of the catalog seemed to be advisable, but, after a deluge of protests and deprecation, it was continued substantially as originally projected. This opposition was not confined to the United States. The librarian of the Royal Society of Medicine of London—Powell—felt that "the possibility of being deprived of the catalog in its present form is horrible to contemplate." Sir Humphrey Rolleston, regius professor of physics at Cambridge and president of the Royal College of Physicians, wrote that this modification would entail—

A very serious loss to all those who read or look at the scientific side of medicine, and would, for them, bring about a condition of affairs resembling that in the first half of the last century.

The late Sir Willim Osler, always an appreciative frequenter of the library said:

Probably few men in the profession owe a greater debt of gratitude to the Surgeon General's library than I.

It is related that once Dr. Osler left a copy of a book he had borrowed from the library on the train and it was not recovered. Dr. Billings punished his great friend by depriving him for a year of his privilege of taking books from the library.

Dr. Billings estimated that one-thirtieth of the world's literature was medical. It is interesting, therefore, to compare the size of the Army Medical Library with the country's largest general collection of books—the Library of Congress. It has been estimated that to maintain Billings' ratio the Army Medical Library would have to contain 160,188 volumes. As a matter of fact, it contains 941,181 volumes. In other words, if the Library of Congress had made a commensurate growth, it would have approximately 30,000,000 volumes—six times its present holdings. The Army Medical Library has the largest collection of medical incunabula in the New World—those books printed before 1500, when printing was in its cradle days. There are approximately 600 medical incunabula known to have been printed; this library has 450 of them, which compares favorably with that of any library in the world.

Of some works the Army Medical Library possesses the only known copy, and of rare books published after 1500 A. D. the collection is one of the best. Among these very rare books are found the oldest publication possessed by the library, Johannes Gerson's De Pollutione Nocturna, printed at Cologne in 1467, the only copy in the United States; Rodericus Zamorensis Speculum Humanae Vitae, printed at Rome in 1468. Of early writings on the plague it has Valescus de Tarantas, De Epidemia, Basel 1470, and Alcanis Luis' Regimen Pestilentiae, Valencia 1490. It has the first printed book on pediatrics, Bagellardo's De Infantium Degritudinibus, and the first purely medical book ever printed, the Arabian physician Mesue's De Medicinis Universalibus, Venice, 1471. We find here the Greek text of the first complete edition of the works of Hippocrates, the Father of Medicine from the famous Aldine press, Venice, 1490; the works of Galen, founder of experimental medicine, a beautiful big folio of two volumes printed by Pincus at Venice, 1490; the first edition of Andreas Vesalius' De Humani Corporis Fabrica, of 1543, the book that laid the basis of anatomical research. In addition to its rare collection of 150 manuscripts, it has an untold wealth of files of medical journals, in some cases the only complete sets in existence. When we behold this great wealth of material we are not surprised that Surgeon General Reynolds, of the Army, states:

No one can estimate the value of these books any more than you can estimate the value of diphtheria antitoxin. It is something that cannot be expressed in dollars and cents because it has no replacement value; it simply cannot be replaced.

"The Surgeon General's Library," says Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, "is a monumental labor which none will ever better." No wonder that Walter Reed said the highest ambition of his life was to succeed Colonel Billings as librarian of the Surgeon General's Office. He was finally appointed, in 1902, and died 1 week after.

Dr. Thomas S. Cullen, the eminent gynecologist of Johns Hopkins, well-known author and trustee of the Enoch Pratt Library, before the Subcommittee on the War Department Appropriation, made the following statement:

This is not only the best medical library in the world but it could not be duplicated for a hundred million dollars. The Army deserves a tremendous amount of credit for having accumulated that library. John Billings was the man who really brought the things together. * * * You could not duplicate it with money. * * * I have gone in there and picked out articles on certain subjects where the author had some experience of his own, and then I would analyze the experience of 20 others with respect to his writing. I just took out the meat of the article, and I would sit down and in half an hour I would have the 20 originals from which I studied together with the pictures, and could accomplish more in that library in a day than I could in Baltimore in 2 or 3 days.

Here is a letter I received from Archibald MacLeish, the Librarian of Congress:

You asked me to say in type what I said by word of mouth—that the Surgeon General's library is one of the greatest special collections of books ever put together, if not indeed the greatest, and that its present lack of housing holds tragic possibilities for American learning, and for the good repute of American scholarship.

You cannot say anything stronger than that. That comes from the Librarian of Congress.

After Dr. Cullen had expressed himself as delighted with the view that the library should be located on Capitol Hill, convenient to Union Station, and near the Library of Congress and the Shakespeare Library, Dr. Woodward, trustee of the American Medical Association, and who was in charge of the legal department of the American Medical Association for a number of years, submitted statistics showing the holdings of the Army Medical Library to be far in excess of those of any medical library in the world. Dr. Woodward was, for 24 years, health officer of the District of Columbia, and testified to the great use the library had been to him, and the great vision of Dr. Billings to establish it on its present basis. He brought out the fact that the library is not a departmental one, but a national institution with its unparalleled facilities placed at the disposal of the medical profession and of medical institutions throughout the country, and that during the past fiscal year 5,867 persons made use of the library reading room. In addition to this physicians located at a distance can borrow books by making application through an accredited library, and that library makes application to the Army Medical Library for a loan of the books, which are forwarded and then returned; 40,000 books are loaned annually on this basis.

Now—

Said Dr. Woodward—

the use of the library is being diminished by reason of the fact that it absolutely does not have adequate space. It seems to me, and I am sure that the people of this city and the people of the country, generally, do not realize what a valuable institution we have in the Army Medical Library. * * * The library in Boston is a wonderful library; the resources and volumes, of course, in that library do not compare with the library here, but the facilities for making use of it are much better.

J. M. Lalley writes in the Washington Post:

Local ignorance as to the importance of the Army Medical Library is not surprising. Its work does not lend to general publicity, and its quarters are such as to repel rather than attract attention. * * * Within its dingy walls is a congeries of medical information of well-nigh cosmic completeness. Here the student can find either in the original, or in reprint, or photostat copy virtually anything of importance ever written in any civilized language living or dead, relating to any phase or division of medicine or surgery.

One function of this library is of such heroic magnitude that Diderot, himself, would have been aghast at the audacity of it. This is the compilation and publication of the Index Catalogue, now in its fifty-first volume, and to continue, it is hoped, ad infinitum. It is probably the nearest thing in existence to that "world brain" wistfully envisaged in the daydreams of Mr. H. G. Wells. Together these volumes form an exhaustive bibliography of whatever by any courtesy can be called medical literature.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, you will pardon me for adverting again to this great work which I have previously discussed, but it does not seem appropriate to close any discussion of the Army Medical Library without a final word about the great work that crystallizes and makes accessible the medical wisdom of the ages—the open sesame, the great Index Catalogue. A small-town physician, verging on 90 years, with a record of great success in his field, once told us:

The Surgeon General's Index Catalogue is my Aladdin's lamp. I rub the lamp and the genie appears and answers my questions.

The Surgeon General's catalog is the physician's Aladdin's lamp, and this magic lamp, beloved story theme of our childhood days, would be a good emblem for this great institution, and much in the manner of the old London hospital with the figure of an angel blowing on a coal, carved over its portal, carrying the Latin inscription, "Forsan scintillula latet," perhaps a faint spark yet remains.

Mr. Chairman, the Great Prophet said where there is no vision the people perish, and we know that where there is no library vision there will only be a commonplace collection of books. We feel that in the person of Archibald MacLeish we have a man of vision, who will aim at nothing short of cosmic completeness for our great National Library. America has contributed to the world its greatest medical library, with a coverage approximating completeness as near as possible with human instrumentality. So now let this country garner in the vast records of human achievement in the field of general literature that are now in the old country exposed to the vicissitudes and hazards of war, the caprices of totalitarian government, threatening the Old World with Armageddon. If civilization in Europe is to be destroyed through the onslaught of the dictators, let America become the custodian of the great heritage of the ages—the literatures of the world—before the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse began their macabre ride through the land. Literature is the expression of life in words, and with the Library of Congress as its palladium it will be safe for all time, where scholars under the aegis of a gifted librarian can limn the figures of the past and paint with facile hands the pictures "that may point a moral or adorn a tale."

Whatever may be the outcome of the European conflict, we know that everything points to a concentration in America of the world's materials for research. Of the estimated 30,000,000 different books that have been printed and distributed, the United States has less than half; in addition to this is the great body of unprinted material, early manuscript, documents accumulated throughout the ages, and modern records of fact, the raw material from which literature is made. This material, both books and manuscripts, should be in our great National Library. In the originals, where circumstances justify; microphotograph copies, which cost about $1.50 per volume, where price would be much in excess of this, or where purchase is impossible; but here they should be, in a form accessible to students; and, may I repeat, under the palladium of our great National Library. This is no dream, Mr. Chairman, but something that only requires a vision and the cooperation of an intelligent and aroused public. We would not have to duplicate our present buildings to house this material, for experts tell us that the entire contents of the British Museum Library, if microcopied, could be stored in a small room.

Mr. Chairman, I have discoursed at some length on these three great institutions, because I wish to show them as a nucleus of what should be the greatest assemblage of means for research that the world has ever known. Here on Capitol Hill, our great Acropolis, we would have an atmosphere of scholarly research, and the proximity to the Capitol would afford ample opportunities for our lawmakers to avail themselves of the results of the various researches carried on and provide easy access to the knowledge required by the complex life of today. In mingling, the scholars and lawmakers would be mutually helpful with their interchange of views and interpretations.

In other words, I want you to envisage on Capitol Hill all the means for research available in the world as far as human agency can devise properly housed, processed, and implemented for ready and quick reference with ample facilities for institutes of any department of knowledge, so that it will be the Mecca of scholars from the world at large and no man on a serious quest shall go empty away. Great buildings are only assemblages of stones and mortar. Only men can make and keep a nation great. Only knowledge can make man potential for good. "Why build these buildings glorious if man unbuilded goes?"

Let us give our people the best facilities for study and research that have ever been amassed; that will enable them to express themselves in works of literature, science, and art; that will help us understand one another, for literature has ever spoken a common language for the children of men. In the language of our poet Librarian, Archibald MasLeish:

How shall we have speech?
The water cries all night upon the beach—
How understand?
The wind calls all day across the sand—
How hear
With listening of the earth so near?
Must we be deaf, be dumb
Till the silence come?

[Applause.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I shall take up this morning something I think is of vital interest to the welfare of the country, especially after the statements that have been made by men high in Government positions about economy in government. First, I call the attention of Members to two planks of the Democratic platform of 1932:

We favor maintenance of the national credit by a Federal Budget annually balanced on the basis of accurate executive estimates within revenues, raised by a system of taxation levied on the principle of ability to pay.

That is the first one to which I call attention, and here is the second:

We advocate a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards and an international monetary conference called on the invitation of our Government to consider the rehabilitation of silver and related questions.

Then we have the question of gold, whereby this administration confiscated all the gold and buried it in a hole in the ground in Kentucky. I call attention to the fact that on June 30, 1939, the Treasury held gold bullion to the value of $16,110,078,913.04. The Treasury's statement of March 30, 1940, shows that we have gold to the amount of $18,432,773,101.19. There is something strange about a situation where our gold assets have increased $2,320,000,000 when at the same time our deficit spending has been, according to this statement, since July 1, 1939, $2,718,391,064.43, a great deficit for a part of a year by New Deal. I want to know how and where, when this Government is spending more than it takes in from day to day at the rate of $8,000 a minute, the Treasury Department can find loose assets lying around with which to buy this more than $2,320,000,000 worth of gold at premium prices.

That is something that ought to be explained by the Treasury, how we are making the purchases of this gold, what is the value of it, and from whom we are purchasing it and then burying it in a hole in the ground in Kentucky. I have always thought that anything that is of no value you would hide away some place. The Government has seen fit to go out and make purchases of a great amount of gold and silver; and what is the object, when they store it so that nobody has the use of it? It seems to me there is something wrong.

I shall now show Members of Congress some of the extravagances of this administration. They talked about a balanced Budget. The President of the United States promised time after time before he was elected that he would balance the Budget. He criticized the former administration for not doing so, and after he came into office he started to economize. We have had the Economy Act. I supported it. Within 6 months after that the President started to undo the things that he promised to do, and then he started on a spree of spending—spend, spend, spend. He promised the American people that he would eliminate bureaus and consolidate departments. He started to consolidate departments a year ago. Since he has decided to consolidate departments, he has put on the Government pay rolls over 100,000 additional employees. Where the economy? He has sent up another bill now in which he says he is going to consolidate a few more bureaus, and he says that it will save $150,000. I will gamble with anyone that before the year is out that consolidation will result in putting more people on the pay roll, because he does not know the first letter of economy, nor does he know a thing about how to consolidate and carry out his promise of economy in government. To balance the Budget you cannot chop off everything at one time. I have a truckload of these bulletins which you see here, which are issued from day to day—Press Intelligence Bulletins, prepared by the Division of Press Intelligence for the United States Government. Any Member of Congress can get them daily. On April 11, 1939, I took the floor and called attention to this. Since that time there has come to my office—and I have a truckload of them outside of the door here—great truckloads of these bulletins being published. Every day they are published, and contain from 125 to 150 pages, and other Members can get them in your office if they wish. I venture that there is not a Member of Congress who ever looks at them. Does any Member on the Democratic side—and there are 10 or 12 here now—ever read them or know anything about them, or what it costs or what the Government is doing it for?

Mr. KERR. What is the name of the bulletin?

Mr. RICH. The Press Intelligence Bulletin.

Mr. KERR. Oh, well, the Democratic side does not have to see them.

Mr. RICH. No; I suppose they have been so intelligent during the last 7 years that the Government had to issue this, not for the Democrats, because they do not need it, but I suppose for the Republicans. Well, I will tell you that the Republicans do not want the goldarned thing coming to them. At least I do not want it coming to me, and I am going to stop it today. It is ruthless, unnecessary expenditure of public funds; a waste of the taxpayers' money. I am going to stop it after today, because if there ever was a waste of Federal money by the Federal Government that is it.

The scissors gang! What is the scissors gang? The New Deal Press Intelligence. Let me show you what they do. I quote from the independent offices appropriation bill for 1941, in the hearings, on page 59, with regard to the operation of the press intelligence, and I want to show you what the Government is paying for the scissors gang. They have a Director of Division of Press Intelligence, to whom they pay $4,600. Then they have a grade 1 administrative assistant to whom they pay $3,200. Then there are two junior administrative assistants at $2,600. These are the people who cut out these newspaper clippings from all over the United States. Then they tell you where they file them. If it takes a truck to file the indexes, it will take a whole building to file the newspapers and the newspaper articles which they receive. They have 13 more clerks at $1,800; an editorial clerk at $1,800; 5 editorial clerks at $1,800; 1 stenographer at $1,800. Then they have got salaries from $1,620 down to $1,440. They have a total of 95 people in the Press Intelligence office, and it costs for salaries to clip these newspapers $147,100 for 1941. That is the money they asked for and you appropriated it. In 1940 they had 84 employees and it cost $127,000. In 1939, when I made the complaint here, they had 58 employees at $91,920. You can see from the time I made the complaint on Tuesday, April 11, 1939, they have increased the employees from 58 to 95, and the cost has increased from $91,920 to $147,100. But by the time they get the supplies and other things in, the total cost on April 11, 1939, was $118,497, and now for 1941 you have appropriated $199,000. One hundred and ninety-nine thousand dollars—just about as useless as the fifth wheel on a wagon; just about as useless as anything could possibly be. Why, Governor, has not this administration stopped some of these things which they promised the people of this country they would stop?

Mr. PIERCE. I wonder myself.

Mr. RICH. Why go on clipping with the scissors gang at a cost to the taxpayers of this country of $200,000 a year to clip newspapers? Then it will require another Archives Building, I suppose, to house the stuff when it is useless, only as political propaganda. They are going to keep all the good things that the newspapers might say about this administration, and of course the bad things they say about the administration they do not want to file away. So that after this administration goes out of power, you will find that there will be more stuff filed away in the Government archives lauding the administration, but there will be mighty little stuff condemning it.

Let me tell you this, however, that 10 years after this administration goes out of power, if we last that long, it will be the most damned administration that this Nation has ever had. Why? Because you promise one thing and you do something else, and whenever you do that it does not go down in history as something noble; it does not go down in history as something that is well worth while.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In the gentleman's study of this type of spending, has he paid any attention to the amount of money which is being spent for streetcar advertising in connection with various programs of the Government? In that connection, I may say that I ride the streetcars quite a bit in the city, and now and then I see from four to eight big display cards in a single streetcar or bus, advertising the different functions of Government. Does the gentleman think that is necessary? Does he think that the taxpayers of this Government should be burdened with that kind of expenditure?

Mr. RICH. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that every day there comes to my desk newspaper advertising, placards, and circulars of all kinds, from the departments, telling what the Government is doing. If you are interested in the Government doing all the business, socializing this Government, making it a communistic government, I think they are doing a pretty good job. I think this administration is doing an elegant job of making this a communistic nation. But that is contrary to the teachings and principles that were laid down by Washington and Jefferson and Lincoln and all the men that we laud and honor in these days, men who tried to make this Government a government of opportunity and a land of freedom.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. RICH. If you are going to continue it as a land of freedom, you cannot put the Government into all kinds of business. You cannot put the Government into the operation of everything, because that is socialism and communism.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In some streetcars you will find as many as three cards, identical, advertising the same agency's performances. Three cards in one streetcar, or three cards in one bus. I do not think any industrial advertising manager would permit such waste.

Mr. RICH. I know the gentleman is right. We hear so much talk about trying to balance income and outgo. I should think the administration on this side of the aisle would want to start doing that while they are in power. Let me tell you that next year the Republican Party will be the majority party in this House, and I guarantee you that we will throw out a lot of this stuff. [Applause.] We will cut this stuff out and stop this ruthless expenditure. We will stop these foolish things—and I do not mean maybe. If I am here, I will do everything I can to help stop it, and I will talk just as much about the Republican administration if it is unfair and does not fulfill its promises as I have about the new dealers now in power.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the lady from Illinois.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I understand that in private life the gentleman is a very sound, sensible, and successful businessman. We have heard a lot of talk over the radio and elsewhere about the encouragement of businessmen and the effort to get them to invest their money and provide jobs for the unemployed. Does the gentleman think it an encouragement to investors and businessmen to have the Government spend money recklessly and not balance the Budget?

Mr. RICH. I may say to the gentlewoman from Illinois that I still believe in the adage that he who wastes will come to want. This is true of any business or any government that spends more than it takes in. It will go into bankruptcy sooner or later. This policy must be changed; this tendency must be reversed. I am frank to say to the gentlewoman from Illinois that the thing which occupies my attention most of the time is how long this country can last with a Government piling up a deficit to the extent this administration has, where in the last 8 years the deficit has exceeded $24,000,000,000. It is nothing less than a crime against the children of the oncoming generation.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. The gentleman referred to the early days, the days of our ancestors when this Government was a success. Were not people in those days encouraged to get out, to invest their time, their energy, and their wealth to build up the country, and primarily because men in public office used sound business principles and the people felt they could depend upon the Government to keep their investments safe?

Mr. RICH. I may say to the gentlewoman from Illinois that our ancestors believed in the dignity of labor, believed that we should work for what we had. The present administration has taken the position that everybody ought to have everything he wants without doing anything to get it. Such a philosophy will undermine the sound and fundamental principles of our ancestors, it will make us a land of mollycoddles, people who have a wishbone where a backbone ought to be.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Then I understand the gentleman does not advocate as a principle of government the robbing of Peter to pay Paul through all sorts of Government programs?

Mr. RICH. I certainly advocate nothing of the kind. I advocate sound, honest, fundamental principles of government where people wanting to eat should be given jobs. [Applause.] If industry is given a chance to make recovery, if confidence is restored in this country, the unemployment and relief problem will quickly be solved. Think of maintaining a situation where for nearly 8 years there have been 9,000,000 or 10,000,000 unemployed people in this country. Even the present administration admits their efforts have been a failure. Anybody with any brains at all knows they have been a failure. [Applause.]

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Let me say to the gentleman that it is my belief that if there were more people in government like himself, as thrifty and careful of Government money as they are of their own money, our Government would go ahead to prosperity and go quickly.

Mr. RICH. I am pretty near broke and disheartened by the New Deal. I have just a couple of coins left. I believe that is the condition of most of the people in this country. But give the American people a chance to engage in business activities without Government competition and with confidence with changed laws and we will soon furnish jobs to the 10,000,000 out of work, certainly we will save this Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, at the outset of my remarks I want to reply to a personal attack that was made upon me the other night over the radio, last Sunday night, by H. V. Kaltenborn, the well-known radio commentator.

If Mr. Kaltenborn impugns my Americanism for doing what Chamberlain, Daladier, and many others have done, of flying in Ribbentrop's airplane, then he is more of a jackass than I thought he was—and that requires some stretch of the imagination.

Mr. Kaltenborn is about the rankest warmonger in America. He is one of that group of internationalists and interventionists who spends his time on the radio spreading war propaganda and trying to inflame the passions and hatreds of the American people.

Mr. Kaltenborn is strong for others to go to war, but where was he when the German bullets were flying back in 1917?

He is one of the leaders of the "smear group" of warmongers who attack every American, including Colonel Lindbergh, who has the courage to openly advocate the maintenance of American neutrality and keeping us out of all foreign wars.

I did not hear Mr. Kaltenborn's remarks, but condemnation from such an interventionist and quarantinist is the best possible commendation to 95 percent of the American people, who are determined to stay out of Europe's eternal wars.

I have served 20 years on the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, and do not propose to remain silent and be insulted or smeared over the radio for trying to keep America out of other people's wars. If Mr. Kaltenborn wants to debate American neutrality and keeping America out of foreign wars, I will be glad to do so over any national hook-up free of charge, but I do not propose to compete with him in unfounded statements and billingsgate.

I am answering this loose statement of Mr. Kaltenborn that I had committed some heinous crime because I flew in Von Ribbentrop's plane. So what? Are we at war with Germany? Is there any impropriety for American citizens to fly in Von Ribbentrop's plane? Are we violating American neutrality? The trouble with some of these interventionists and internationalists is that they think we are already at war with Germany because they want us to be at war with Germany. Was it un-American for Under Secretary Welles to speak to Von Ribbentrop or even to Hitler? Yet that is the kind of argument, the kind of war propaganda, that covers this country, and especially from such warmongers as Mr. Kaltenborn.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Or was it un-American for Welles to ride in Hitler's private train?

Mr. FISH. It is the same, identical thing. Was it improper for Daladier, of France, or for Chamberlain, of England, or others to ride in both Hitler's and Ribbentrop's planes?

I want it understood right from the beginning that I have no apology to offer for riding in Von Ribbentrop's plane and I have no regrets for doing it either. Germany was not at war at the time and we are not at war with Germany now in spite of the warmongers and foreign propagandists. Moreover, the American people do not intend to be eased or pushed into any more foreign wars for war profits or by foreign propaganda.

It was very courteous of him to extend this privilege to me because I wanted to get to Oslo in a hurry and I was delayed in seeing him. But this shows how weak the arguments of the internationalists are, those who want us to intervene in Europe. They must impugn the Americanism of those of us who are trying to keep this country at peace.

They even distort my motives by trying to make out that I was unneutral and un-American, because I flew in the plane of a foreign minister of a country with which we are at peace. What nonsense. Yet that is the kind of propaganda that is being spread all over this country. It is all right for a French officer in wartime to fly in our newest model warplane but wrong for an American Member of Congress to fly in a German plane in peacetime.

Today's New York Herald Tribune carries the following article on the first page in big headlines:

Get United States into war at any cost, Ontario official urges Canada. Victory may be very doubtful without help, Attorney General Conant fears; suggests the Alaska highway and St. Lawrence seaway as bait.

Is the United States to be put on the auction block and sold to the highest bidder for our help in the European war? Are the lives of our youth to be sacrificed on the battlefields of Europe in order to build the St. Lawrence waterway or because of a highway to Alaska? That is carrying propaganda a little bit too far, but it is typical of what is going on in America at the present time. I am convinced, and I think everyone in this House is convinced, that 95 percent of the American people, regardless of party, insist on staying out of Europe's war unless we are attacked by a foreign foe. American soldiers are not Hessian mercenaries or for sale at any price or at any time.

We are being told now that this is another war to make the world safe for democracy. That is what they told us 20 years ago. What a mockery, what a farce, and what a tragedy. When we see those Old World nations that have gone to the left and to the right into dictatorships and despotism, Italy into fascism, Russia into communism, and the war propagandists repeat now we must enter this war to make Europe safe for democracy.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PIERCE. The gentleman mentioned invasion of America. I would like to know what he means by defense? Does he mean defense of the Hawaiian Islands, the Caribbean Sea, the Alaska fisheries, or South America? In other words, where is the line?

Mr. FISH. From my viewpoint defense of America means, first, the defense of the United States and all of its possessions and maintenance of the Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. PIERCE. Clear to the Philippines?

Mr. FISH. As long as we have the Philippines, and Lord knows I would like to get rid of them, the sooner the better, and as long as they are a part of our possessions we must defend them. As Theodore Roosevelt said away back in 1907—and there never was a more courageous American than Theodore Roosevelt—in a letter written William Howard Taft, then Secretary of War:

The Philippines is the Achilles heel of the United States. We must get rid of them now in time of peace. We will never surrender them in time of war.

He was right. If the Philippines are attacked while under our control, of course we have to defend them. In answer to the statement made by the Attorney General of Ontario, Mr. Gordon Conant, I am willing to say publicly that if Canada is invaded I think we should, in accordance with the principles and spirit of the Monroe Doctrine, go to her assistance; that is, if actually invaded by a foreign foe, not if a few shots are fired from a submarine or a few bombs are dropped from an airplane, but if it is invaded we ought to go to war and defend it against attack. No one has a more friendly feeling toward Canada than I have, and I am sure the American people would never permit a foreign invasion of Canada any more than they would a foreign invasion of Mexico or of Latin America.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In connection with the gentleman's statement with reference to the Philippine Islands, I think it would be very interesting to the gentleman if he would read a recent speech made by President Quezon to the legislature over there, in which he discusses this very subject from a little different angle than that heretofore followed by him. I recently read his speech and I think it contains some amazing statements pertaining to our relationship with the Philippines.

Mr. FISH. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, the purchase of gold is the most costly and disastrous of all New Deal experiments. If I were to be asked, "What is the height of all New Deal follies and of all New Deal failures?" I would say it was the purchase of gold at $35 an ounce, twice the cost of production in South Africa where 50 percent of all the gold comes from, and three times the cost of production of the gold that comes out of Soviet Russia.

Mr. Chairman, I do not question the motives of President Roosevelt and others who may have been responsible originally for this unfortunate policy. In time of depression apparently it is an open season for all kinds of quack doctors and fake financial programs. Back in January 1934, when this policy was put into effect, President Roosevelt probably sincerely believed that it would increase the price of agricultural products; at the same time President Roosevelt wisely said: "This is an experiment based upon trial and error."

We have had this costly experiment now for 6 years and it certainly has not increased the price of agricultural products which are still 50 percent below the level existing between 1921 and 1931, and over 50 percent below the prices of 1926, which even Democrats have been trying to get back to. The administration's gold policy has been a monumental failure. We have set up a golden calf to worship which we have no more use for than Moses did for the biblical golden calf.

In April 1937, just 3 years ago, I introduced the following resolution:

Joint resolution to restrict the purchase of gold by the Treasury

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed not to import or buy any gold from foreign sources except in payment of merchandise, services, or lawful debts.

I reintroduced the identical resolution yesterday, to stop buying gold. Since the time my original resolution was introduced 3 years ago, we have acquired or bought $6,000,000,000 of additional gold at twice or three times the cost of production. Mind you, I am not opposing the subsidy of $35 an ounce on American-produced gold, I am only referring to the foreign gold, gold acquired from foreign sources at a ridiculous and artificial price.

What can be done before we commit financial suicide by buying all the gold of the world at this artificial price of $35 an ounce? The only alternatives seem to be to reduce the price for foreign gold or stop buying gold from foreign nations. For the time being, the latter course seems advisable. It is my honest and sincere belief that if we reduced the price of gold from $35 an ounce to $30 an ounce, all it would do would be to increase the avalanche of gold into the United States. There is only $27,000,000,000 worth of gold in the world, and we have almost $19,000,000,000 of that amount. If we reduce the price of gold by as much as $5 an ounce, and the foreign nations think we are going to lower the price again, there will be a veritable avalanche of gold into America. All the remaining gold of the world will be buried out in Kentucky or hidden away in our back yards.

South Africa produces one-half of the gold. What do we do? We buy it at twice the cost of digging it out of the ground in South Africa, transport it over here, and dig it back into the ground in the State of Kentucky, where it grows no interest, where it feeds nobody, clothes nobody, and houses nobody, where it actually impairs world trade, because Germany, Italy, Japan, and other nations have no more gold left and therefore are completely off the gold standard, not having any gold with which to trade, and must trade through bargaining.

The value of gold or any currency thrives on use and faith but shrivels in disuse and fear. We have a veritable plague of gold buried in the hills of Kentucky. Like Midas of old, everything we touch becomes golden, but unfortunately like him we cannot eat gold. This golden avalanche has become a white elephant, conceived by brain trusters, radical college professors, and theorists without practical business or financial training or experience.

Our gold policy has turned into a fiasco. It is so fantastic that no one will believe it, not even Members of Congress. I challenge the Democrats to take some constructive action on it. They will not. They have a bear by the tail and do not know how to let go. This was thrust upon Congress by the early brain trusters and wand wavers. Nobody knew how it was going to work, not even the President. No member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, which introduced this measure, had the faintest idea what would happen. Yet nothing is being done by the Democratic Congress to correct the deplorable, costly, and ruinous situation, and I predict it will be one of the great issues in the campaign. The gold situation is so fantastic that the people themselves can hardly believe it. They simply do not believe it possible. The public are apt to think it may be partisan talk, as it is too much like a fairy story for them to swallow. It is up to the Republicans to present the facts honestly and without exaggeration.

I am merely stating the facts, all of which can be proved. Veritas magna est et praevalebit—the truth is mighty and will prevail. These facts must be told to the American people and will prevail. Uncle Sam, with almost $19,000,000,000, over two-thirds of all the gold in the world, is the greatest hoarder in the world today, in spite of forbidding by law American citizens from owning or hoarding gold themselves.

We are still buying millions of dollars of gold every day from foreign nations at twice the cost of production, enriching them and impoverishing us. The gold problem has been disastrously mismanaged by the administration, and we are reaping the whirlwind of that New Deal folly in America. [Applause.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROWE].

THE GENERAL ANTHONY WAYNE MEMORIAL COMMISSION

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Chairman, during the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress, I was appointed by the Speaker of the House as one of the members of the General Anthony Wayne Memorial Commission. The Commission is made up of nine members. Three were appointed by the President of the United States and are as follows: Hon. W. A. Kunkel, Jr., Fort Wayne, Ind.; Hon. Harry G. Hogan, Fort Wayne, Ind.; Hon. William Wayne, Paoli, Pa. Hon. William Wayne is a great-great-great-grandson of Gen. Anthony Wayne.

Three were appointed by the Vice President of the United States and are: Senator A. V. DONAHEY, of Ohio; Senator ROBERT A. TAFT, of Ohio; Senator FREDERICK VAN NUYS, of Indiana; and three were appointed by the Speaker of the House and are as follows: The gentlemen from Ohio, Representative CLIFF CLEVENGER and Representative Dow W. HARTER, and the gentleman from Indiana, Representative EUGENE B. CROWE.

At a meeting called for May 17, 1939, which was held at the Capitol, I was selected chairman of the Commission. The call for this meeting was made under House Joint Resolution 406, of the Seventy-fifth Congress. This Commission came into being and life because of this resolution. This is a matter of fact which cannot and must not be overlooked or ignored. The purpose of this resolution which was enacted by the Congress of the United States was, in brief, the formulation of plans and design for construction of a permanent memorial in the city of Fort Wayne, Ind., to Gen. Anthony Wayne.

I found, however, very soon that this resolution alone was not going to meet with universal approval. I found if this resolution was strictly adhered to that it could not succeed. I found that much work had been done in other communities. I learned the Maumee River Scenic and Historical Highway Association had been much interested looking forward to not just a shrine or memorial to Gen. Anthony Wayne. They had been working toward securing a larger and much grander memorial to this great personage. They have thought of a parkway of several hundred miles of roads traversed by General Wayne. I had considerable correspondence on this matter during the spring, summer, and fall of 1939. The leading light and spirit of this program in the State of Ohio is the editor, Mr. Ralph Peters, of Defiance, Ohio, who is chairman of the Maumee River Scenic and Historical Association.

On May 10, 1939, the gentleman from Ohio, Congressman CLEVENGER, introduced H. R. 6269, which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, copy of which I am introducing now for the RECORD, this bill to be known as the General Anthony Wayne Memorial Parkway. The purpose of the resolution by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CLEVENGER] says nothing of a shrine at Fort Wayne, Ind., but asks only for a memorial parkway.

A bill to authorize a survey of the military route of General Anthony Wayne during the Indian wars, with a view to constructing a national parkway to be known as the General Anthony Wayne Memorial Parkway

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to cause the National Park Service to make a survey of the military route of Gen. Anthony Wayne during his campaign against the Indians in the Northwest Territory in 1794; the same to be known as the General Anthony Wayne Memorial Parkway. The said survey shall locate the parkway as nearly as practicable in the original route. An estimate of the cost of construction of an appropriate national parkway on this route, and such other data as would be valuable, shall be obtained by said survey, with the objective of determining matters concerning the construction of the parkway.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended in carrying out the provisions of this act.

At the organization meeting held in Washington, members of the Commission drew up a tentative draft of a resolution. It apparently had the approval of the majority of the members of the Commission. I was instructed to introduce it in the House and Senator TAFT, of Ohio, to introduce a companion bill in the Senate. I now offer copy of the bill I introduced, H. R. 6375, to be entered at this point in the RECORD.

A bill authorizing a survey of the military route of Gen. Anthony Wayne

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to further and amplify the purposes outlined in House Joint Resolution 406, first session, Seventy-fifth Congress, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to cause the National Park Service to make a survey of the military route of Gen. Anthony Wayne during his campaign against the Indians in the Northwest Territory in 1794. The said survey shall outline and locate a parkway as nearly as practicable in the original route, and indicate the type and location of an appropriate permanent shrine or memorial to Gen. Anthony Wayne along said parkway or at its terminus. An estimate of the cost of construction of this combined memorial project and such other data as would be valuable shall be obtained by said survey.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended in carrying out the provisions of this act.

This bill, you will notice authorized the National Park Service to make a survey of the military route of Gen. Anthony Wayne during his campaign against the Indians in the Northwest Territory in 1794. It further asks for the location of a parkway near the original route and it also provides for an appropriate, permanent shrine or memorial along said parkway or at its terminus. This bill was drafted in accordance with the wishes and desires of the members of the Commission who had assembled. Each member of the Commission had been duly notified of the call in due form by letter and were called by telephone to apprise them of the meeting.

A further bill, S. 2441, was introduced by Senator TAFT. I desire at this point in the RECORD to introduce a copy of this resolution.

A bill providing for a survey of the proposed General Anthony Wayne Memorial Parkway

Be it enacted, etc., That, for the purpose of accomplishing the matters outlined in Public Resolution No. 64, passed by the Seventy-fifth Congress, and to assist the members of the General Wayne Memorial Commission, appointed by the President to function under the terms of the resolution, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to cause the National Park Service to make a survey of the military route of Gen. Anthony Wayne during his campaign against the Indians in the Northwest Territory in 1794, the same to be known as the General Anthony Wayne Memorial Parkway. The said survey shall locate the parkway as nearly as practicable in the original route. An estimate of the cost of construction of an appropriate national parkway on this route, including plans for designing and constructing a permanent memorial in the city of Fort Wayne to the said Gen. Anthony Wayne, which shall be and become a part of the general plan of providing the General Anthony Wayne Memorial Parkway and such other data as would be valuable shall be obtained by said survey, with the objective of determining matters concerning the construction of the parkway.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended in carrying out the provisions of this act.

Since it appears that this resolution meets more widespread approval than the bill I was asked to introduce, which is H. R. 6375, I have introduced a companion bill in the House to S. 2441, H. R. 9213. When consideration is given to these bills I shall be glad to have the one adopted that appears to meet with widest approval.

This resolution would call for a road or highway to be known as the General Anthony Wayne Memorial Parkway.

It must not be forgotten that this Commission, of which I am chairman, is working under Public Resolution 64 of the first session of the Seventy-fifth Congress. Without this or some such resolution passed by the Congress there would not today be a General Anthony Wayne Memorial Commission. Nevertheless, to make it a success and an accomplishment it must of necessity go beyond Public Resolution 64. Accordingly, I have attempted to bring together the divergent opinions and get an agreement and common ground on which to work.

I called a meeting of the Commission to meet at Fort Wayne, Ind., on December 14th. In the call I asked that all interested people in Indiana, Ohio, and Michigan meet at Fort Wayne to make an extended survey of this matter. Accordingly, a most interesting and enthusiastic meeting was held at that city. We spent the first day in conferences and surveys of the city and of other points of interest. At the confluence of the St. Marys, St. Joseph, and Maumee Rivers and at points known as The Portage, the dividing line in the waters running to the lakes and the other way to the Mississippi River. A most interesting and enlightening address on Gen. Anthony Wayne and his activities in Indiana was given at a night banquet by Dr. L. A. Warren. Various committees were represented at this meeting, principal among them State of Indiana Anthony Wayne Memorial Commission, chairman, Mrs. Bessie K. Roberts; the Fort Wayne Anthony Wayne Memorial Commission, Carl J. Suedhoff, chairman; the Chamber of Commerce Anthony Wayne Memorial Committee, chairman, Attorney Clarence R. McNabb; the Allen County-Fort Wayne Historical Society, chairman, Mr. Brown Cooper.

The committee appointed to arrange a suitable memorial to General Wayne selected from the common council of the city of Fort Wayne, whose chairman is Paul C. Wolf. The following members of the General Anthony Wayne Memorial Commission were also present: Hon. Eugene B. Crowe, M. C., Bedford, Ind., chairman of the Commission; Hon. W. A. Kunekl, Fort Wayne, Ind., secretary of the Commission; Hon. Harry G. Hogan, Fort Wayne, Ind., treasurer of the Commission; Hon. Wm. Wayne, Paoli, Pa., and Hon. Cliff Clevenger, M. C., of Bryan, Ohio.

The gentleman from Indiana, Congressman GEORGE W. GILLIE, of the Fort Wayne district, was very active and most helpful in the entire program around Fort Wayne before and during the meetings and afterward as well as the following day en route toward Toledo. All the members present, as well as the gentleman from Indiana, Congressman GILLIE, cooperated in this meeting to make it the success that it was. A splendid compliment of interested people from Ohio were also present. The general understanding obtained at that meeting was that there must be a gettogether of the interests and desires. Gen. Anthony Wayne was too great, and did too much for the territory of several States including Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan as well as much other territory to have him remembered by only dedicating one particular thing to him.

The following day we made a pilgrimage from Fort Wayne ending at Toledo, Ohio, where another good meeting was held. During the day we stopped at many points of interest along the route of Gen. Anthony Wayne in his conquest of this territory. Numerous points of vantage and of great interest, chief of which were: Fort Defiance, Fort Winchester, Independence State Park on the Maumee River, parkways in and near Napoleon, Ohio. Battlefield of Fallen Timbers State Park and Fort Meigs at Perrysburg, Ohio.

This entire trip was led by Mr. Ralph Peters, of Defiance, Ohio, who is chairman of the Maumee River Scenic and Historical Highway Association. He had a most interesting meeting at Defiance, Ohio, and a splendid luncheon with short talks by numerous persons assembled. This meeting showed conclusively that Mr. Peters and his organization were determined to work for harmony and ultimate success. Throughout the day, and it was an entire day, traveling from Fort Wayne along the old canal and Maumee River to Toledo ending with a dinner in the evening at Toledo, where again many from Detroit and other points in Michigan, from Toledo and points all along the proposed route including some from Fort Wayne were assembled.

I found considerable thought at Toledo that had not yet reached a point of full cooperation in a combined project. I found considerable thought both in statements made in the meeting and statements made to me personally, of a parkway—a parkway only. I believe, however, that thought has been almost entirely eliminated. If it has not, it should be and must be.

At our meeting at Defiance, quite a group of splendid fellows met with us from Greenville, Ohio, including the gentleman from Ohio, Congressman ROBERT F. JONES, of Lima. They desired recommendation for the parkway to extend at least to the city of Greenville. There are grounds for their contention, and I believe that ultimately this parkway will and should be extended to other points in Ohio and other points in Indiana, but for the time being, if we expect to get this project over at all, I consider we must not get too large.

There were numerous places where battles were fought by General Wayne at Greenville, at Fort Defiance, at Fallen Timbers, and numerous other skirmishes, and conflicts were had, but the objective of General Wayne was Fort Wayne, where the city of Fort Wayne is situated. There are other most important battles, to be sure, but, after all, every campaign has one objective, and this one had one. General Wayne was the third general who had been sent to take that sector for the Colonies. No campaign was or could be successful until that objective was reached. Therefore I am thoroughly sold, and I believe almost everyone is now sold, on the thought that Fort Wayne is the place for the memorial or shrine. What it is to be, how it is to be constructed—whether a monument, whether a colosseum, or what not—I believe it too early to decide. It is true Public Resolution 64 asks that the investigation be made and that a report be made to Congress. I cannot see that the report can be made at this time. I have become fully convinced, and I believe other members of the commission are convinced, that this should be more than a shrine. Many other interested people and many other sccieties, both in Indiana, Ohio, and Michigan, are of the opinion that a parkway should also be established. After making this tour, after spending some 4 days all told with the hearings, with the surveys and going to and from, I am thoroughly convinced that it should be a shrine and parkway.

The parkway should, to start, include the route from Fort Wayne through Defiance, past Fallen Timbers and other towns and cities along the route, on to Toledo and to Detroit. I am not, however, sold on a vast expenditure of money for this proposal. Greater highways are needed already to accommodate the traffic along that route from Fort Wayne to Detroit. Those highways should come along under the regular procedure of road building with Federal aid as other Federal-aid roads are built. The parkways along this route, along the beautiful Maumee River and along the Old Canal, can be, with nominal expense, made one of the beauty spots of America. It will make one of the most interesting highways in the United States. This work might well be done, as I see it, with W. P. A. labor. I do not mean the highway. That should come under the regular road-building program. I refer to the parkways, shelter houses, park benches and tables, shrubbery, cleaning the grounds, getting them planted to grass, planting trees for shade, and what not. The shelter houses should be good, sound, and substantial, but there is no need for expensive structures. Some of them could have dirt floors even and be open, just the shelter only. Other shelter houses might be entirely closed and have concrete floors.

This program, after all, of sufficient road and parkways could ultimately be completed without any additional drain on the Public Treasury. Let me explain my statement. A sufficient road and better roads are already needed and must be built along this highway. They will be built ultimately, whether it is ever known as a General Anthony Wayne Memorial Highway or parkway or not, so I recommend to the Congress that the work on this highway be speeded up and that it be made adequate for the great travel that is already on this highway, and I would even add to that, because when this route is established and beautified along the rights-of-way, the travel will increase. Nevertheless, as I stated, this highway will and should be built anyway. Therefore it need not be treated as additional expense to the Federal Government.

Now I also said that the parkway need be little, if any, added expense to the Federal Government. We have our W. P. A. labor. It is generally conceded that, because of the changed condition of America, that we will continue to have for at least 20 years a continuous surplus of more or less from year to year of unemployment. The unemployed will be given labor from year to year. Various kinds of work will be proposed. Various kinds of programs will be set up. I know of nothing in that section of the country that could be of service to more people than the building of parks and structures for people to use for recreation and pleasure. That should be done along this parkway and make it a beauty spot, an outstanding beauty spot, of America. It need not be done in one particular or certain year. The program should be surveyed and layed out. The work should be started, working to a goal, a completed parkway.

Now, when it comes to the shrine itself: That is and must be a different matter. While the parkway and highways will cost in reality several times more money than the shrine will cost, nevertheless the shrine is the most important part of this program. It is and will be the crowning achievement. People from all over America will drive over this parkway, but they will, after all, have an objective in mind. They will want to see the terminus. They will want to see the end of this project. They will want to see the shrine at the point which was the objective of George Washington, the father of our country, when he sent three generals with their armies to conquer it. They will want to see the place where Gen. "Mad" Anthony Wayne brought his victorious troops and brought to a successful conclusion his numerous campaigns in which he spent several years to achieve. That point was Fort Wayne where the city of Fort Wayne, Ind., is situated. This point is where the shrine, consisting of a shaft, monument, colosseum, or whatnot, should be constructed. This, as the crowning part of this program, should be worthy and fitting and exemplary of the great personage we are attempting to honor. It, of course, must be constructed by artisans skilled in their trade as it will stand as an everlasting monument not alone to General Wayne, but a symbol of the greatness of our Nation. It will be a symbol of respect of our Nation not alone to General Wayne but to all who participated in broadening, extending, and strengthening this great United States in that which was at that time wild and frontier lands.

Personally, Gen. Anthony Wayne did not touch my home nor any point of my district. Selfishishly, I might disclaim any interest in this program. Matters of this kind require lots of time, effort, and energy. When asked by the Speaker of the House to become a member of the Commission, I knew it would entail some energy and work, but when chosen by the committee to act as chairman, I realized that would entail an endless amount of work, but I accepted it and accepted the responsibility. Now that I do not live on any of the routes of Gen. Anthony Wayne, I believe that I can without prejudice or without bias see this situation from a broad-minded viewpoint. In that connection, I recommend to the Congress that the Federal appropriation of $30,000 be granted for the surveys. I ask that it be for surveys for the route from Fort Wayne, Ind., through Defiance, Fallen Timbers, Toledo to Detroit. I ask that the survey be made, not for one part of the program but for a survey for the highway and for the shrine. The two can and must go hand in hand. One cannot and must not have precedence over the other. It must be one program, one General Anthony Wayne Memorial, which is to be a shrine and a parkway.

Personally, my interest in this program is to see it brought to a successful conclusion. I want to see it obtain on a national scale. It should be viewed from a national aspect just like we view Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, George Rogers Clark or any other great man of this Nation. This can and should be of as much interest to the people of Maine, Kentucky, Louisiana, and California as it is to the people of Indiana, Ohio, and Michigan. To do that, it must be placed on a great and national scale. Furthermore, it must be free and kept free from any narrow or partisan bias. Partisanship in any form will kill the program for years to come. I shall endeavor in every way possible to perfect and further the interests of the General Anthony Wayne Memorial Commission. [Applause.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the able, distinguished, and valuable Member from Pennsylvania, Mr. GROSS.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, as I address the House today I want to call to your attention a few of the issues that are of interest to everyone. First, America's No. 1 problem is to keep out of the war. The women of America are opposed to war. They know that as long as men fight women must weep and children must become orphans. The way to keep out is, first, want to keep out, and then stay out.

I learned a day or two ago that the national debt now exceeds $48,000,000,000, and that this has been an increase from $21,000,000,000 during this present administration. The interest on that vast amount of money at the present low rate is far beyond a billion dollars a year. I am wondering if we plunged into a period of prosperity and interest rates advanced to where we have seen them in the good old days how we could raise the money just to pay the interest. In 1913 our Government cost $34 per family to operate. In 1939 it cost $540 per family. Our national debt is now more than fifteen hundred dollars per family. This refers only to the Federal debt.

Since 1932 we have appropriated about $24,000,000,000 for relief, and after 7 years of New Deal planning and New Deal spending we still have around 11,000,000 unemployed people. The Federal Government has appropriated for farm relief since 1933, $4,000,000,000. The Secretary of Agriculture figures this amount in the farm income whenever he has occasion to mention the farm income to the public. But he is not fooling the farmers; they know better than that. The farmers of this country are not dumb. They know that the Government gives no money away that it does not first take from the people. This money has been used to pay farmers to grow less, but the farmers knew long before, and are now convinced, that the less they grow the poorer they will be, and their soil likewise.

These $4,000,000,000 have simply become a mortgage on the real estate of the country, and while they have been paying farmers to grow less, and while they have been putting into effect trade treaties which resulted in none other than free trade in agricultural products we have seen our foreign markets slipping away from us. And recently we heard the President say, while admitting that the farm program has failed, that it was due to Europe's war. The past history of agriculture prices in this country is that always during a war the prices of farm commodities advanced. They tried to point out to us the advantages the American farmer has, due to the trade treaties, but when I refer to the 1939 reports from the Department of Commerce I find that under these trade treaties we have imported, in 1939, vegetables valued at $18,112,265. We have imported 93,859,000 pounds of potatoes. We have imported dairy products worth $14,142,800, or 78,698,000 pounds of dairy products. We have imported poultry and egg products worth $1,800,000 dollars. We have imported 753,570 head of live cattle worth $20,206,700, and 150,794,000 pounds of meat products worth $27,312,000; canned tomatoes, 55,400,000 pounds; raw tomatoes, 48,793,000 pounds; and while the farmer who has a beef hide to sell usually gets enough money for it to buy a pair of work shoes, we have imported 223,446,000 pounds of hides worth $47,056,400. Surely it becomes the job of the Secretary of Agriculture and the President, who say, "We planned it so," to explain why the American farmer shall be thrown into competition with the rest of the world.

It has long been established that farm income is the governing factor in our national economy, and agriculture is still our basis of wealth. A profitable agriculture would solve the dual problem of idle acres in the country and idle men in the city. With all this planning, with all our acres lying idle, and with all these agricultural imports we are still building up surpluses of agricultural commodities in this country that are alarming. We now find ourselves with around 15,000,000 bales of surplus cotton on our hands and surpluses of other farm commodities in proportion. The cotton farmer with 50 or 100 bales of cotton lying in his shed does not have enough money to buy a cotton shirt.

If the Wallace program for the corn farmer is carried on for another year, we will have sufficient corn on hand that it will not be necessary to plant any for 1 whole year. If these imports were stopped and the American market was retained for the American farmer, which is, after all, the best market in the world, there is no question that in a short time we will have a prosperous agriculture and then very quickly would follow a decline in our relief rolls that would solve our unemployment problem. Yet the administration boasts of the fact that our exports, due to these trade agreements, have doubled in some cases. But if we look at the record, we will find that some poor South American country that purchased 100 automobiles in 1937 purchased under a trade agreement, 200 automobiles. Certainly that is an increase of 100 percent. But I am telling you that if the American farmer had the American market, if he got cost of production, for example, if he received $1.25 for wheat, 10 cents for hogs, and 80 cents for corn, I am sure that my county would buy 3,000 new automobiles the first year and at least 500 tractors, refrigerators, and everything else in comparison. And what is true of my county applies to every other agricultural county in the United States. The records show that rural America has bought 19 out of every 100 automobiles built in 1939. Certainly if that is true, and the farmers received the prices I have just mentioned, they would buy at least 45 percent of the automobiles built.

While we have cut down our corn acreage tremendously we have imported starch enough that would have taken 450,000 bushels of corn to produce in a single year. While we farmers sell our fat cattle at a loss, we find the Government buying Argentine beef in vast quantities, and when lard is a drug on the market and butter is piling up, we find the Government buying lard and butter substitutes for the Army and the Navy.

I said the farmers are not dumb. They are asking the question and they are going to demand an answer. They want to know why the Government has enforced a program that is impoverishing them and then digging vast sums out of the Federal Treasury in order to keep them going. There is only one answer, and that is they are trying to buy the farm vote. Knowing that they cannot buy it, we now see the Federal loaning agencies which at one time were free and independent of politics serving the best interests of all concerned, crowded into the Department of Agriculture, which puts Secretary Wallace in the position to say to the American farmer who is compelled to borrow from the Federal Government, "Sign on the dotted line." And when he signs on the dotted line he gets the loan he has applied for, and he has signed every bit of liberty he ever enjoyed so far as operating his farm independently is concerned. They will be in a position to tell him how many acres of this, that, or the other crop he can plant. They will tell him how many cows he shall keep. They even hand him a budget as to how he should spend the income from his farm. If this is not regimentation, then I want the powers that be to show me. Hundreds of thousands of farmers have been forced and are now being forced in order to keep their property intact and their families together to sign on the dotted line. But I am telling Members of the majority party here today that I am sure the farmers of this country will register their resentment of this Stalin procedure with a vengeance next fall. [Applause.]

I have absolute confidence in the judgment of the people of this country, and, while I am amazed that they have swung so far to the left, I see them everywhere becoming more tax conscious. They know that American industry today pays in about $1.50 a day tax on every man every day he works, and that is just about as high as the wages were when most of us were boys. Why, I have one company in my city, York, Pa., that in 1938 paid $880,000 in taxes. I have another company employing less than 600 people paying $370,000 tax. and while there are those who say it is all right to tax industry, we have heard it so often, but the average man is beginning to know who really pays the tax. The management of these companies pay this tax first, before wages are paid out of profit, then they pay the wages to the men out of profit, and then pay a dividend to the stockholders out of profit. In order to do all this one of the first things they do is lay off men, speed up the machines, and the workers they retain finally pay all of these with their sweat and blood, for only men who produce ever pay. So in the factory it is the worker and on the farm it is the farmer and his family who bear the burden. They have taken it on the chin for 7 years as though they really liked it, but today it is everywhere evident that there is a rising wave of just resentment sweeping the country.

The American farmer believes in relief, but he knows that a relief dollar does not solve any problems; but when a man has a job and earns his dollars in industry and spends that dollar for food, that sale registers back on the farm and helps solve the workers' problem as well as his own. I am convinced that the American farmer will speak in no uncertain terms before the end of this year, and what they are going to say will be, "We are going to maintain our constitutional form of government," for they remember that in this democracy, as Chief Justice Hughes once said, "What the people really want they generally get." They know in countries ruled by dictators, the dictators change the people, but they also know that in democracies governed such as ours the people can change the President, and that is what they are going to do next November. [Applause.]

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, by direction of a member of the committee, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

SILVER AND THE INTER-AMERICAN BANK

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, we rapidly approach the golden anniversary of the Pan American Union. This is an international organization created and maintained by the 21 American republics: Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, United States, Uruguay, and Venezuela. The first international conference of American states was held at Washington 1889–90, and presided over by James G. Blaine, then United States Secretary of State. Far-reaching resolutions were approved by the conference at its second meeting in Mexico in 1901; the third, at Rio de Janeiro in 1906; the fourth at Buenos Aires in 1910; the fifth at Santiago, Chile in 1923; the sixth at Habana, Cuba, in 1928; the seventh at Montevideo, Uruguay, in 1933; and the eighth at Lima, Peru, in 1938.

April 14 is celebrated annually throughout the Americas as Pan American Day; and on this date the final chapter of a proposal, which goes back for many years, will be brought to a conclusion. Around the long mahogany table in an ornately furnished sunny room in the Pan American Union, a representative of our Government will sit down with the representatives of various Latin American countries, and will place his signature of approval on a project which has on it the distinctive fingermarks of our neighbor to the south, a country which has quite systematically proceeded to take, without consideration, property of American citizens, and while this program of confiscation has been in progress the United States has been banqueting Mexico at the table of good neighborliness.

The proposed inter-American bank, about to be set up in celebration of Pan American Day, April 14, is to come into operation. Only a few days ago, at which time announcements were made in local papers pertaining to this undertaking, many of us were informed for the first time of this scheme designed to knit the Western Hemisphere, but this proposition is by no means new.

Mexico is a great producer of silver. And for many years her astute monetary and precious-metal experts have been anticipating exactly what will happen on April 14. At the inter-American conferences the sagacious spokesmen for Mexico have repeatedly cultivated an approach to this consummation. I am informed that as late as last fall, when the proposal was again submitted at Guatemala, several of the other Latin American delegates refused to have anything to do with the proposition. And, I understand, a reference to the official minutes of that conference will disclose that certain delegates claimed that the proposal "treated of a new theme immediately related to the problem of bimetallism." The idea was brought to Washington, and in the hands of the Inter-American Financial and Economic Advisory Committee, consisting of 21 experts in economic problems, one for each of the American republics, the soft clay has been molded into the inter-American bank proposal, which is to be approved April 14.

In the proposal's new habiliments it is making its debut under the sponsorship and approval of generous Uncle Sam. In view of the numerous reports which the people of the United States have received in recent months and which inform us of the Moscowian doctrines which appear to be engulfing Mexico and its institutions, our people can well afford to watch with increasing interest and understanding this implement which is being so largely created in response to the pressure of Mexico's monetary experts and political philosophy. Frankly speaking, we can go directly to the heart of the proposition by asking: Does Mexico now propose to have its philosophy of government and economics financed by the United States, or at least by a formulated number of the other American republics, and all under the aggressive leadership and participation of the United States?

We may properly ask another question: Has the administration, operating through the State Department, in effect endorsed, and is it now about to ratify and finance this grandiose Mexican plan and all in the face of the fact that Mexico has, in our language, stolen more American property from our citizens than any other country in the history of our Nation? American citizens have gone into the Latin American countries to the south of us where they have invested their private savings in agricultural and industrial activities.

While Mexico has for years promoted the creation of such a financial institution for the alleged purpose of facilitating the establishment of new industries and to make possible the use of silver as one of the mediums for international payments, it has at the same time driven out of Mexico many American citizens who had gone there, established their homes, built their enterprise, but who since have been forced, under the whip of Mexican officials, to return to the United States penniless and destitute and without compensation under due process of law for their private properties taken away from them by a ruthless Mexican Government. Will Congress, by the signing of a convention by a representative of our State Department, be committed to a program of financial aid and sustenance of a country which has so treated our nationals and all without any compensation to them?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I would like to ask the gentleman a couple of questions. In the first place, does the gentleman understand that this bank can be set up unless Congress grants it a charter or does Congress have anything to do with that matter?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have been unable to clear in my own mind the answer to that question because of what happened in connection with our silver arrangements made in 1933, wherein the convention or the arrangements were, I believe, perfected without action on the part of the Congress. The situation, as best I am informed at the present time, is that Congress will have to act and grant a charter to the bank.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. If the gentleman will permit one more question, what does the gentleman understand it to mean when it says that metal stocks of the various nations shall be available to this bank on at least as favorable terms as to their own governments?

Mr. CRAWFORD. In going through the press history of this undertaking back for several years, I have traced it back for some 10 or 12 years, and you could even go back to the nineties; it appears that the project will be so organized that these countries can actually deposit in this bank their gold and silver reserves, and that these reserves can then be used as a basis for expanding credit to facilitate the operations of the countries in question.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Does the gentleman think they could be used by the banks exactly as the nation that deposited there would use it?

Mr. CRAWFORD. No; I think it will all be woven into the central-bank structures of the nations participating, but this whole proposition is in the embryonic stage. I think many people are giving very serious and conscientious consideration to its short-term and long-term powers and possibilities, and out of all of it we may find something good; but it is well for us to consider these different approaches, and here I am simply throwing in a few comments in connection with the Mexican silver approach.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, previously I obtained from the House consent to include in my remarks the following data, which I now present:

BRIEF PRESS HISTORY OF UNDERTAKING

Examination of documentary material relating to the proposed inter-American bank leads to the conclusion that the bank proposal is a Mexican scheme. It also leads to the conclusion that, in addition to making such a bank a channel for expending American capital in Latin America, a major motive of Mexico's in seeking the bank has been the hope that the bank may constitute the means for perpetuating the subsidy to Mexico which the purchase of foreign silver by the United States initiated.

The Treasury's activities on behalf of foreign silver date from the signing of the London silver agreement by Senator KEY PITTMAN in July 1933. Later that same year a Pan American Conference was held at Montevideo, Uruguay. There Mexico pressed for a 6- to 10-year moratorium on all public and private debt; at the same time for the establishment of a pan-American bank. Thus, on December 4, 1933, the Associated Press reported from Montevideo as follows:

"URGE PAN-AMERICAN BANKING

"MONTEVIDEO, December 4.—A proposal for an inter-American system of money and banking was made to the Seventh Pan American Conference today by Dr. José M. Puig Casauranc, Foreign Minister of Mexico.

"The Mexican diplomat suggested that a central banking house be established which would have supervision over a series of central banks. At the same time he advocated the establishment of a pan-American currency, backed in part by silver, and established on the basis of commodity price levels.

"He also revealed the intention of Mexico to sponsor a 6- to 10-year all-American moratorium on public and private debts." (New York Times, December 5, 1933.)

A few years ago Dr. Antonio Espinosa de los Monteros, who last November represented Mexico at the Guatemala "meeting of American treasuries," made the following statements, which threw light on previous events (Banco Nacional de Mexico, Review of the Economic Situation of Mexico, December 1935–January 1936, p. 8):

"It is of utmost importance that we make all possible efforts to consolidate the position of silver and that we succeed in making it form part of the reserves of the central banks. Ever since the Pan American Conference was held in Montevideo I have not ceased my efforts to demonstrate that all that is done in favor of silver will be useless until the interested nations reach an agreement making it possible to use the white metal, not so much as a circulating medium or reserve of the internal circulation, but as an integral part of the reserves of the central banks for the liquidation of international balances. * * *

"Mexico must sponsor an agreement between the nations interested in the fate of silver in order to make possible its use for the settlement of international balances." (At Montevideo in 1933 Dr. Espinosa de los Monteros was technical adviser to the Mexican delegation.)

Mexico's interest in the creation of an inter-American bank again was made quite clear at the Panama Conference, September 23 to October 3, 1939. This was a conference of ministers of foreign affairs of the American republics convened by the Government of Panama.

THE PANAMA CONFERENCE

The work of the Panama Conference was divided among three committees, one of which, committee III, was devoted to economic cooperation. Its membership consisted of representatives of six countries, including Dr. Antonio Espinosa de los Monteros. (Under the caption "The Silver Situation," the Banco Nacional de Mexico in its Review of the Economic Situation of Mexico, issue of December 1935–January 1936, published an article by the Mexican economist, Dr. Antonio Espinosa de los Monteros, who spent some time in the United States as an observer, presumably of Mexico's silver interests in Washington. In that article Dr. Espinosa de los Monteros explained the determination of the Roosevelt administration to deal directly with silver-selling countries as an effort on Mr. Roosevelt's part to obtain equivalent concessions to the United States. But, this Mexican economist and observer sagely remarked: "We feel sure that our Government will be careful not to make concessions out of proportion with those made to us.")

To this committee at Panama were referred more than two score economic projects, proposed by various countries. (The information in this paragraph is taken from the Pan American Union's Congress and Conference Series No. 29, especially pp. 6–7.) It was as a result of the recommendations of Committee III that there was ultimately set up, in Washington, the Inter-American Financial and Economic Advisory Committee, which latter committee in turn worked out the charter and bylaws of an inter-American bank.

Among the 23 economic proposals or projects which were submitted to committee III at Panama, the fifth was a Mexican project for the creation of an inter-American financial institution. The purpose of such an institution, according to the Mexican scheme, "would be to make possible and assure permanent cooperation between the central banks of the American republics."

Among its proposed activities would be: (a) The facilitation of the settlement of international balances, (b) the avoidance of sharp and frequent fluctuations in the relative values of the different American currencies, and (c) aiding the movement of capital between the American nations. The Mexican proposal further suggested that, at the then-forthcoming meeting of American treasuries at Guatemala City, detailed proposals for such a bank should be presented.

A separate Mexican idea presented at Panama asked the "normally creditor nations" to establish as soon as possible permanent and stable bases for the acceptance of silver in liquidation of inter-American trade balances.

It is therefore not surprising to find that the resolution on economic cooperation submitted to the Panama conference by committee III and adopted by the conference on October 3, 1939, recommended establishment of an inter-American financial and economic advisory committee among whose duties would be: To study the creation of an inter-American financial institution and "to study the possibilitiy that silver be also one of the mediums for international payments."

THE GUATEMALA MEETING

The first meeting of finance ministers of the American republics convened at Guatemala City on November 14, 1939, as an outcome of the resolution passed at the eighth international conference of American states at Lima in 1938. At its closing session on November 21 the finance ministers' meeting resolved, "That the Pan American Union undertake * * * to present to the American governments a draft proposal for the establishment of an inter-American exchange system to facilitate in accordance with sound principles the regularization and availability of foreign exchange as between all the nations of America. (Bulletin of the Pan American Union, February 1940, p. 67.)

The Guatemala meeting also recommended that "the necessary capital be invested for the promotion of the agricultural and industrial development of the various countries in this hemisphere." It recommended study by the inter-American committee in Washington of the proposal to set up a Pan American bank.

On November 15, 1939, the Havas News Agency reported from Guatemala City as follows (see Washington (D. C.) Times-Herald of November 16, 1939, for full text of the Havas report):

"A Mexican plan for an inter-American 'central bank' with United States support emerged tonight as the probable key proposal to be placed before the conference of American Treasury representatives here. * * *

"The proposal for an inter-American bank was made by Eduardo Villasenor, Mexican Finance Under Secretary, before the committee on banking policy.

"Today the banking policy committee met in joint session with the committee on monetary policy to discuss the scheme. The third committee, on exchange, is also expected to discuss the subject, thus placing the proposal before all the delegates.

"The banking committee tonight decided to recommend to the conference that the central-bank proposal be sent to Washington for consideration by the pan-American committee of economic experts now meeting there.

"Villasenor's proposition is based on a plan put forward at the 1933 Pan American Conference at Montevideo. It has one new element, however—granting of long-term credits to Latin American nations.

"The Mexican proposal calls for creation of a bank through the cooperation of the central banks of all the American nations."

That Mexico was the prime mover in the adoption at Guatemala of the resolution regarding a bank is a conclusion supported by the official bulletin of the meeting. (Cf. Boletin de la Reunion de los Ministros de Hacienda de las Republicas Americanas, Numero 6, Guatemala, 20 de Noviembre, Año 1939, pp. 93–95.) The November 20 bulletin reported that the meeting's banking commission considered the Mexican proposal concerning establishment of a "Pan American financial institution."

As its "main point," states the official Bulletin, Mexico submitted the proposition that, "with the object of obtaining and guaranteeing the economic stability of the American republics and their future development, it is necessary to take immediate steps to assure, as soon as possible, the establishment of a Pan American financial institution, with the cooperation of the central banks of all of the countries." The Bulletin then gave a six-point list of functions of the Mexican-proposed bank, as follows (see Boletin, op. cit., p. 94):

(a) To act as an international foreign-exchange clearing house, thus reducing to a minimum international bullion movements.

(b) To represent the several American central banks in the international capital market.

(c) To aid the associated central banks to stabilize their respective currencies internally as well as externally.

(d) To systematically study commercial and exchange problems, etc., of mutual interest.

(e) To receive silver as well as gold from any country in settlement of international debit balances in the ratios and at the prices judged convenient, provided the proposed institution has first made an agreement on this point with the United States Government.

(f) Act as a channel for capital invested to promote the economic development of the different American countries.

It is interesting to note the coolness with which the above proposal of Mexico's was received by other members of the banking commission. According to the official bulletin of the meeting (pp. 94–95): "The Argentine delegation did not show itself in accord with the Mexican delegation's proposal, principally because it treated of a new theme immediately related to the problem of bimetallism, which, in its (the Argentine delegation's) judgment, should be studied by a competent technical body. The Brazilian delegate proposed that the matter be brought to the attention of the economic and financial advisory committee at Washingon, given the magnitude of the theme and the nature of the functions of that body."

The Haitian delegation took a view similar to the Brazilian, while the Salvadorean delegation, although in sympathy with the Mexican proposal, was not in accord with the bases for its establishment set forth by the Mexicans. Finally, it was decided to refer the matter to the Inter-American Financial and Economic Advisory Committee in Washington, and a resolution was passed calling on the latter committee to study the project and work out details.

PRESENT STATUS

At present the inter-American bank proposal is under consideration by the American republics. It was the object of its proponents to secure the reactions of the 21 governments during March so that the bank may come into being on the fiftieth anniversary of the Pan American Union, April 14, 1940.

The draft convention (to which the bank's charter is annexed) must be accepted by 5 governments having acquired a total of 145 shares of stock. The convention in its first article states that: "The United States of America also agrees to grant to the bank a charter substantially in accordance with the proposed charter annexed hereto."

If the executive branch of our Government accepts the convention without Senate ratification it will amount to the executive branch committing the Congress of the United States to the issuance of a charter for such an international bank. The London silver agreement is an example of Executive ratification of an international agreement.

By reason of the agreement the United States undertook to do a great deal for the world's sellers of silver (Mexico being the largest producer), with virtually no corresponding contribution from any of the beneficiaries of the agreement. Now another Mexican finance scheme is being hatched whereby the United States will be expected to be the goat as in the case of silver.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, by direction of a member of the committee, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I wish to commend most heartily the action of the Appropriations Committee in cutting down this bill approximately $112,000,000. I find, however, that there is included in this bill, on page 30, lines 3 and 4, an item for $1,000,000 to acquire an additional 52,000 acres for Fort Knox. As I recall, they have now approximately 40,000 acres. The 52,000 acres is estimated to cost $1,640,000. The amount appropriated in this bill will be part payment of this sum.

Our colleague the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CREAL], of the Fourth District, in which Fort Knox is located, is opposed to this item. This item was not recommended by the Bureau of the Budget or by the President. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CREAL] has pointed out to me that this will take up perhaps 25 or 30 percent of the acreage of Meade County, many churches, schools, villages, highways, nearly 500 farms, the R. E. A. electric lines, and cut off the people of other parts of Meade County and other sections from the bridge or bridges on the Ohio River. No hearings were held on this item and, so far as I can see, no one has appeared and justified the acquisition of this large acreage and the expenditure of this large sum of money.

Meade County has a bonded indebtedness of $136,000. The taking of this land will mean a loss of revenue to that county of $18,750 annually. This acreage will also wipe out two villages and will cut off the connection of the people of other sections of Meade County with Louisville. The acquisition of this 52,000 acres and the disruption of the economic and social life of that section should be undertaken only after hearings are held and the Government and the citizens have an opportunity to be heard. Why jump into this matter blindly?

If this appropriation is necessary and did not result in great detriment to the people of that section, I am sure our colleague the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CREAL] and I would favor it. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CREAL] or myself will introduce an amendment to strike this item from the bill.

GET RID OF COMMUNISTS AND ALIENS

I strongly favor a committee amendment to this bill to eliminate alien workers and Communists on the Panama Canal and Panama Railroad. Our colleague the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] gave us some very interesting information in his speech yesterday on the floor of the House about Communists employed on our ships and at the Panama Canal.

More than 2 years ago the American Federation of Labor at its national convention called to the attention of the country and the Congress that there were about 13,000 persons employed by the United States Government on the Panama Canal and Railroad and that 10,000 of these were aliens, and 3,000 of the 10,000 were skilled workers from various countries in Europe.

For us the Panama Canal is the crossroads of the world and is one of the very important units in our national defense; yet we have 3,000 skilled alien workers there in charge of the maintenance and operation of the complicated and delicate machinery of this great Canal. Why should this be in the hands of aliens from European countries? No doubt many of them come from nations that are unfriendly to our country, and I do not doubt that among these are some Communists. How easy it would be for some of them to render useless in almost the twinkling of an eye this Canal so that our warships and other ships could not pass from the Atlantic to the Pacific or from the Pacific to the Atlantic.

We have invested more than $500,000,000 in this great undertaking. I am very happy to support the amendment of the committee to eliminate all of these alien skilled workers. However, we still have 7,000 or more of unskilled alien workers there and we are adding new workers in great numbers every day. Loyal American citizens only should be placed on guard of this great key unit of our national defense. We are spending millions to strengthen the Nation's defenses there. We have millions of unemployed loyal American citizens. Why place aliens in charge?

BILLIONS FOR WAR—ONLY MILLIONS FOR PEACE

Mr. Chairman and colleagues, I strongly favor adequate national defense in the way of ships, men, submarines, airplanes, and other equipment. The Republican Party has always stood 100 percent for adequate national defense, but in the last 2 years, and especially during this year, we have heard nothing but war, war, and the preparation for war, and our people have been held in constant alarm about the likelihood of our being involved in some European, Asiatic, or African war, and we have neglected to solve our great domestic problems.

Our interests lie on this side of the Atlantic and Pacific, and not in Europe, Asia, or Africa. Who can, with consistency, entertain the thought that we are threatened with attack from France, or England, or Germany, or any other country? These European nations have their hands full, and when they get through with warring among themselves, they will be too much exhausted to travel three or four thousand miles to attack the United States. There is no reason for this country to get into a foreign war unless we want to butt into it. What nation in Europe desires to take on the United States as an active war enemy, in addition to the nations with which they are now at war? Germany made that mistake in 1916, 1917, and 1918, but no other country will make it again. Congress will keep this Nation out of foreign wars.

If there is any threat to us from any foreign nation, it is Japan. This administration has added to that threat. Ever since the ruthless and unwarranted conquest of China began 2 or 3 years ago we have been furnishing to Japan 60 percent of her war materials. And for what? She has destroyed the cities of China, our friend, and murdered 4,000,000 Chinese citizens, 2,000,000 of whom were women, children, and old men—noncombatants. All the time we have been helping to destroy and weaken our friend in the Far East and building up the power of that great potential enemy of the United States—Japan. Military experts agree that Japan could not have overrun China but for the war supplies furnished to her by the United States.

After building up this great potential enemy of the United States, then the administration comes along and asks for billions of dollars to enlarge our Navy and Army to meet this potential enemy.

UNEMPLOYMENT THE GREATEST PROBLEM AND THREAT

Can anyone recall where any great nation was ever destroyed by forces without? They have always fallen by reason of conditions and enemies from within. The great threat to our peace and security is within our own borders.

The report of the C. I. O. recently stated that there were approximately 11,500,000 unemployed industrial workers in America. The A. F. of L. fixes the number at 10,500,000. The Department of Labor reports show that unemployment increased 1,161,000 in January 1940 over December 1939; and recent reports show that unemployment increased more than 250,000 in January, and the prospects are that business is further declining and unemployment will continue to increase.

I have heard some of our New Deal colleagues say on the floor of the House that there are 11,000,000 unemployed industrial workers in this country. Here is the real threat—11,000,000 workers without jobs to provide shelter, food, and clothing, and educational opportunities for themselves and their families. Next to this are the big deficits and debts created by this administration.

Many of these unemployed are without hope and their lives are filled with grief, disappointment, and sorrow. Although most of them are loyal American citizens, this is a fertile field for the plausible but false remedies offered by communism and other subversive groups in this country. We must get rid of these subversive groups, these alien enemies, and provide jobs for our people. The greatest tragedy of it all is that there are 4,000,000 young people under the age of 24 years, 2,000,000 of whom are graduates of high schools, colleges, or universities, who have never yet had a regular job. If they are to continue to have faith in our Government and our institutions, we must find real work for their minds and their hands, real jobs with real American wages and salaries.

THE NEW DEAL ADMINISTRATION HAS FAILED

For many years businessmen, professional men, farmers, other groups, and the Republican Party have pointed out that the New Deal policies could not and would not solve our problems and in the end the Nation and the people would find themselves in worse condition than they were in on March 4, 1933. Our New Deal friends said that these criticisms came from those who were unfriendly to the New Deal.

The American Federation of Labor, headed by William Green, and the Congress of Industrial Organizations, headed by John L. Lewis, through the years were ardent, loyal, and consistent friends of the President and his administration. The United Mine Workers provided nearly $500,000 to the campaign fund of President Roosevelt in 1936. Mr. Lewis rallied the three or four millions persons in his C. I. O. to the support of the President and his party. President William Green of the American Federation of Labor and his organization were very active in support of the President in his first race and in his last race. The President has never had more loyal or devoted friends than these great organizations and their leaders. Now let us see what they have to say.

I am reading to you from a statement issued by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, at Miami, Fla., on January 31, 1940, which is as follows:

> Unemployment still is the most acute domestic problem of the Nation. No orderly and intelligent effort has yet been made to determine the facts with regard to its causes, its extent, its cure. As a nation we have not hesitated to spend billions for the relief of those who are unemployed, but we have neglected to take the necessary steps to reduce and end unemployment.
> At this time there are not enough jobs in private industry to go around. This is largely due, in our opinion, to the fact that lack of confidence has stunted business growth and expansion. We demand that those in authority take whatever steps may be necessary to restore business confidence.
> We urge that all Government actions that tend unnecessarily to discourage business expansion cease and that a positive effort be made to encourage greater industrial activity. We have learned the lesson that when opportunities for profit diminish, opportunities for jobs likewise disappear.

What does the great American Federation of Labor executive council say—

> Unemployment is still the most acute domestic problem of the Nation. No orderly and intelligent effort has yet been made to determine the facts with regard to its causes, its extent, its cure.

Yes; unemployment is the biggest problem of the Nation, and unfortunately no orderly or intelligent effort has been made by the New Deal to solve it. The dole is not the solution.

What reason does the executive council give for this condition of unemployment?—

> This is largely due, in our opinion, to the fact that lack of confidence has stunted business growth and expansion.

What does the council demand?—

> We demand that those in authority take whatever steps may be necessary to restore business confidence.

And—

> We urge that all Government actions that tend unnecessarily to discourage business expansion cease and that a positive effort be made to encourage greater industrial activity. We have learned the lesson that when opportunities for profit diminish, opportunities for jobs likewise disappear.

Yes, they say there is a lack of confidence and they demand that those in authority take steps to restore business confidence. This statement admits that business has been discouraged. They insist that actions that tend to discourage business should cease and that business should be encouraged to go ahead. They insist that if we take away the profit incentive, the jobs disappear. In other words, those who have money must believe there is a chance to earn some profits and that the Government will not so restrict them or compete with them and lay such heavy taxes as will augur against success.

I desire to read to you the statement of John L. Lewis, Chairman of the C. I. O., at the United Mine Workers of America convention at Columbus, Ohio, January 24, 1940:

> As the current year opens, the Democratic Party is in default to the American people. After 7 years of power, it finds itself without solution for the major questions of unemployment, low national income, mounting internal debt, increasing direct and consumer taxation, and restricted foreign markets. There still exists the same national unhappiness that it faced 7 years ago. Labor and the people are losing confidence. They fear for the future, and rightly so.

What does Mr. Lewis, the ardent friend and supporter of the President and the New Deal, say after 7 years of trial:

> The Democratic Party is in default to the American people. After 7 years of power it finds itself without solution for the major questions of unemployment, low national income, mounting internal debt, increasing direct and consumer taxation, and restricted foreign markets.

No; the administration has not solved the unemployment problem. There are more people unemployed now than when Mr. Roosevelt was first elected. We still have a low national income. Our national debt has been increased from twenty-one billion so that with the appropriations made this Congress it will have exceeded the debt of $45,000,000,000 by the end of the next fiscal year, beginning July 1, 1940, according to the statement of the President himself and according to the records of the Treasury Department.

Yes; there has been a great increase in direct and consumer taxes on the American people. The Federal Government, in the last year that Hoover was in, collected $1,800,000,000 in revenues. For 1939 the Federal Government collected approximately $6,000,000,000, an increase of over 200 percent in 7 years.

The reciprocal-trade agreements that labor has opposed, and I understand still opposes, and which are likewise opposed by the farmers generally, made it possible to bring in $4,000,000,000 of farm products in direct competition with the American farmers and in the 7 years to bring in billions of dollars of manufactured and processed goods in competition with the American workers.

It is little wonder that Mr. Lewis concluded his statement with these words:

> There still exists the same national unhappiness that it faced 7 years ago. Labor and the people are losing confidence. They fear for the future, and rightly so.

Mr. Lewis and Mr. Green, together representing approximately 8,000,000 union workers, while differing on other subjects agree on one thing—that the New Deal administration has failed. Unemployment, taxes, Federal deficits, and debts are on the increase after 7 years. These and other great related problems remain unsolved; and when the President and his New Deal friends cry "War! war! war across the seas," are they not trying to turn the minds of the American people from the failures they have made and the hopelessness that confronts them after 7 years of the New Deal?

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. BENDER. The gentleman is making a very fine speech. Is it not a fact that over $60,000,000 worth of silk hose worn by women in this country came in from Japan?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Yes; under the reciprocal-trade agreements of Mr. Hull and this administration. Before the reciprocal-trade agreements were entered into by our Nation with Japan we received 300,000 yards of textiles from Japan annually. After we entered into the reciprocal-trade agreement with Japan there was a jump to 30,000,000 yards of textiles from Japan annually, and since the reciprocal-trade agreement has been in effect we have received great quantities of manufactured and processed goods from other nations, and, as I pointed out, there have been brought into this country $4,000,000,000 worth of agricultural products in direct competition with American farmers. These reciprocal-trade agreements are helping to increase unemployment in this country, and for these and other reasons I am still, and I have always been, unalterably opposed to the reciprocal-trade agreements.

Our distinguished Secretary of State never did believe in the protective tariff. He urges that the trade barriers between this Nation and other nations be broken down and removed. When we do this, it places American workers, farmers, and American industry on the same level with the farmers, workers, and industry of Japan, China, Mexico, and other countries employing peon labor, child labor, with long hours, poor working conditions, and sweatshop wages. It is little wonder that the farmers and workers of this country are opposed to the reciprocal-trade agreements.

Mr. ROUTZOHN. I just want to ask one question: Will buying silk stockings from Japan guarantee peace with Japan?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. One of the main reasons urged for the reciprocal-trade agreements by Mr. Hull and the administration is that it promotes peace among nations. We know how well Japan has kept the peace since we made the reciprocal-trade agreement with her. She has carried on the most ruthless and cruel conquest in China in all the history of the world. She has bombed, burned, and destroyed the great cities of China, wrecked their industrial plants, and murdered four million of her citizens, one-half of whom as I have said, were women, children, or old men.

TAXING, BORROWING, SQUANDERING

Mr. Roosevelt said in his speech at Pittsburgh, Pa., on October 19, 1932, in criticizing the Hoover spending:

> The most reckless and extravagant pace I have ever been able to discover in the statistical record of any peacetime government anywhere, anytime.

And he further said:

> We find that the expenditure for the business of Government in 1931 was $3,168,000,000.

We were then in a depression. Mr. Roosevelt in his first message to Congress on March 10, 1933, said that we were on our road to bankruptcy because we had had 3 consecutive years of deficits amounting in the aggregate to about $4,000,000,000. If the Congress follows the President's recommendation for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1940, his administration will have had appropriated by Congress for the 8 years approximately $75,000,000,000, and with at least $25,000,000,000 of deficits, with the national debt pushed beyond its limit of $45,000,000,000, and we then will have had not 3 but 11 consecutive years of deficits.

In all the administrations of all of the Presidents from George Washington, beginning April 30, 1789, including Herbert Hoover, March 4, 1933, a period of 144 years, there were appropriated approximately $66,000,000,000, but with these $66,000,000,000 we carried on all the activities of our Government. We paid off the debt of the Revolution and fought all of our wars, including the World War, we built the Panama Canal, made the Louisiana Purchase, bought Florida, made the Gadsden Purchase, bought Alaska, the Philippine Islands, and Puerto Rico, and we spent billions improving our rivers, harbors, and our highways and in developing this Nation.

The New Deal has operated upon the theory that this Government can tax and squander and borrow and spend the people of this country into prosperity, and that we can destroy our crops and our stock, and by scarcity bring about good times, and that we can regiment labor, agriculture, and industry, and place the activities of 130,000,000 American people under the control of bureaucrats here in Washington and restore confidence and good times. Labor, the farmers, and industry now can see clearly that such New Deal policies have failed, and it is clear now how the American Federation of Labor and the C. I. O. can say that the Democratic Party is in default to the American people. The great problem of unemployment has not been solved, and there is a lack of confidence among the people.

The President in his recent message to Congress told the Congress that even though the Congress should stay within the Budget, Congress must make provisions for $460,000,000 of new taxes, or we would go beyond the debt limit of $45,000,000,000 by the end of his administration, that is, the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1940. Notwithstanding this warning, it looks now as if the President's budget will be exceeded, and the Democrats are not taking any steps to raise these taxes to meet these appropriations as urged by the President, and therefore this country will be in the position of exceeding its legal debt limit and cause increased uneasiness and lack of confidence.

Our New Deal friends act to me as if they expect to turn the whole thing over to the Republicans next January. The Treasury and the country will be stripped. Are they taking the attitude recorded in history wherein Mme. Pompadour, a favorite of King Louis XV of France, when his reign of shameful waste, oppression, exorbitant taxes, and broken-down confidence was about to come to a close, said to her king, "After us, Louis, the deluge."

You New Deal Democrats know that you are going to exceed the debt limit of $45,000,000,000. You know you are not going to provide any additional taxes to meet it. Let the Republicans clean up the wreckage. The Republican Party has met and solved every crisis that has ever arisen in this Nation beginning in 1861, and if entrusted by the American people with the control of this Government, confidence will be restored, business will be encouraged, pay rolls will take the place of relief rolls, common sense, honesty, and industry will again be considered as desirable traits, the youth of our land will again have opportunities, and American markets will be restored to American labor, farmers, and industry. [Applause.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. THORKELSON].

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak in behalf of a group of forgotten men and women whom I do not believe anyone will deny are real Americans. These people have been very considerate and patient with us, as they have received little consideration for the losses which they have sustained by our invasion of their domain.

At one time these people roamed the prairies of this great land, independent and free, unhampered by laws, regulations, and other political trappings so destructive to free government. They were a healthy people, free from those diseases which go hand in hand with civilization, and as I compare their lot today with the privileges extended to those who stream into our ports from foreign countries, my heart goes out to the North American Indians.

I do not believe there is a nation or a people that has been exploited more and received less consideration than these original Americans, for they have been treated as foreigners, and a foreign nation, within this great North American Continent, which was formerly their home. They have been pushed back from the open spaces of their own domain, and impounded in places comparable to concentration camps. In these enclosures, they have been left to shift for themselves, under the domination and rule of masters appointed by those who deprived them of their country, their homes, their liberties and rights.

Would anyone say that they have been treated justly, or even with the same courtesy and consideration as the most unwelcome visitor to our shores? I think not, for they are ruled, regulated, and dominated by the Interior Department, the Indian Department, and reservation departments, until they may as well be, as I have already said, in an actual concentration camp.

In spite of such handicaps, many of them are very well educated and fill important positions in professions, in business, and still retain an inherent sense of justice which, I may say, it would be well for us to emulate. This shows that they are indeed well adapted to look after themselves, as they are unquestionably loyal to our Republic, and I am sure will, if relieved from bondage, develop as is their right into useful, self-supporting citizens, and as such contribute to the general welfare of the United States. Their loyalty is clearly revealed in the vain efforts which have been made by them to induce Congress to lend its help for the removal of radicals and teachers of communism who have, under the sanction of the Interior Department, unfortunately infiltrated among the Indian tribes.

With this in mind, I last year introduced an amendment to the Constitution to delete the words in article I, section 8, paragraph 3, "and with the Indian tribes." The same resolution has now been introduced in the Senate, and I shall ask the Judiciary Committee to give this resolution due consideration and report it out of the committee so that it may be discussed on the floor of the House. This, in my opinion, is not only an act of justice but it is the simplest manner in which the inherent rights of the Indian may be restored to him, and inasmuch as it is a part of the Constitution it must be amended according to article V.

I shall now quote article I, section 8, paragraph 3:

> Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

And let me add, for the common defense and for the general welfare of the United States.

It is in this language, Mr. Chairman, that this paragraph should be understood. I say, therefore, that it is not for the common defense and certainly not for the welfare of our Nation to treat the original Americans as a foreign people and a foreign nation within our own borders.

I can readily see why the phrase "and with the Indian tribes" was incorporated in the Constitution, for the Indians, being led by the British, often engaged in unprovoked attacks upon the early settlers, but I am quite certain could they speak today they would make the same request that I now make, that this Government restore citizenship rights to the Indians.

The condition that now exists is not for the general welfare of the Indian, because he is actually denied the right to make a living for himself and his family on the same basis as other citizens. No self-respecting people can develop into useful citizens when treated like slaves or prisoners, and it is in that position the "noble red man" finds himself today. He cannot engage in business without supervision. He cannot engage in any independent activities without being regulated and restricted by his overseers. Will anyone say that that is twentieth-century justice? Is it an act of justice on our part to condemn these loyal subjects into perpetual subordination, restriction, or imprisonment on the parcels of land which have been allotted to them?

Mr. Chairman, let us now look at this situation from a purely mercenary standpoint. The administration of Indian departments, Indian bureaus, Indian supervisors, and other white medicine men, has cost the taxpayers of the United States millions and millions of dollars, all of which could have been saved had we been fair enough to restore full citizenship and equality to these original Americans. These departments that regulate the Indians are purely political and have been used by the politicians as headquarters to exploit the Indian and divide his possessions. No one has benefited from this except grafting politicians, and, Mr. Chairman, do you not think it is time that we cast this obnoxious parasitical group adrift? I believe our people are beginning to realize the evil of political parties and of control by those who, in order to hold their possessions, engage in partition of the Nation's wealth. It is this same group that when placed in charge of our Government engages in mass legislation and squandering of the Nation's resources without giving the slightest consideration to the fact that such laws deprive the people of their liberties and rights, and that unwarrantable squandering of money leaves us in dire poverty.

Mr. Chairman, it is that picture which confronts us today, and the most vivid example of such laws is that of the Indian himself, who is by law bound within a small confine under the guardianship of people frequently morally inferior to himself, overseers with little sense of justice or responsibility, who because of their position exploit those they should protect.

Congress is responsible for this and should now shoulder that responsibility and set the Indian free, for he is not only equal but actually superior to many of those now enjoying free entry into the United States. The Indian is a much more loyal American than many of those who have been provided by the administration to administrate his affairs, for he objects to communism and he does believe in the fundamental principles of this Republic. He asks for the same rights that we declared were ours in the Declaration of Independence.

We shout about justice, fairness, and equal rights, and we pride ourselves on good sportsmanship. I say let us now live up to our words and be good enough sports to give the Indian an opportunity to enjoy those rights of which he should never have been deprived, and for which the founders of this Nation fought, to establish a republic directed and ruled by the people so that all could secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and to their posterity.

The quickest and the surest way to give the Indian his rights is to adopt an amendment to the Constitution, deleting the words, "and with the Indian tribes." This will cut the Gordian knot that has tied the American Indian to the apron strings of the many bureaus and departments, legislation and appropriations for which are constantly drawing fire on the floor of the House. So I say, looking at it from a purely mercenary viewpoint, this should have the unanimous approval of the taxpayers of the United States; and, looking at it from the point of justice, no one can deny that the Indian is entitled to the status of an American citizen.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, let me take up where the gentleman from Kentucky left off. He quoted the statement of Louis XIV, who said, "After us the deluge." Frankly, I am a little concerned about that deluge, because we are doing some things that may aggravate the size of the deluge and, incidentally, hasten its coming. I have particular reference to the gold policy of this country.

How interesting it is to jump on the transport of fancy and project our minds, if we can, to a hot July day in 1896, when a 36-year-old midwesterner stood before the Democratic National Convention in Chicago and made there a speech which has come down the corridors of time as the cross of gold speech. I quote from that celebrated ringing challenge of William Jennings Bryan a portion of the last paragraph:

> Having behind us the producing masses of this Nation and the world, supported by the commercial interests, the laboring interests, and the toilers everywhere, we will answer their demand for a gold standard by saying to them: "You shall not press down upon the brow of labor this crown of thorns, you shall not crucify mankind upon a cross of gold."

That will be 44 years ago on July 7, 1940. Forty-four years later the Democratic Party, the party of William Jennings Bryan, is found engaged in crucifying mankind not only upon a cross of gold but upon a cross of silver as well. It seems rather unreal when we look back over the period of two generations that the very thing which Bryan dreaded is the thing which his own party has imposed upon this country and, for that matter, upon the world.

In 1929 we had substantially one-third of the world's gold supply. Then came the money doctors, then came the professorial experts, then came the economic and monetary authorities; and they began to preach the doctrine of making the dollar cheaper that prices might go up, squeezing a bit of the gold content from the dollar that foreign trade might be stimulated. There was Dr. Berle, there was Dr. Warren, there were all the other authorities who finally persuaded the administration to tinker with the gold standard, persuaded the administration to make it a crime for a citizen of this country to have in his possession gold in excess of $100, persuaded the administration to take gold out of circulation as a medium of exchange, and use it only in bullion form for the settlement of international balances. Yes; we impounded gold.

And then the result in 1940; and to make sure that it is documented, here is the Treasury statement which came to my desk this morning, dated March 30, 1940. We have on hand 526,650,660 ounces of gold, the value of which is $18,432,773,000. So, 44 years after Bryan was talking about the crucifixion of our people upon a cross of gold, this administration has been assiduously crucifying them upon a cross of gold which today contains more than 17,000 tons, representing about 70 percent of the world's gold supply and valued in excess of $18,000,000,000.

That is not the whole story. The hoard is growing every day. It is growing every week. This cross is getting larger.

This morning's Washington Post reports under this headline on the financial page, "Canadian gold pours into United States for war goods," the following:

> The Commerce Department said yesterday that $231,237,068 worth of gold came into the United States in the week ended March 27, the largest amount since weekly compilations were begun in 1934.

Yes, our cross of gold is soon going to contain much more than 17,000 tons, and it is on the way to $20,000,000,000 in value. Yet our citizens find it criminal if they own gold. We cannot lend it to the nations who are indebted to us as a result of the last war. We cannot lend it to those who are engaged in controversy on the other side of the ocean, because that is interdicted by the Neutrality Act. Its use becomes restricted in the arts because the price is $35 an ounce as compared to $20.67 before gold was devalued.

In addition we have to spend money to transport this gold around the country. Pending before us is the War Department appropriation bill. They contemplate expanding Fort Knox in Kentucky from 31,000 acres to approximately 51,000 acres. We have two or three regiments of cavalry and artillery there, and we are going to add more. That is where our gold is buried today.

What a paradox! A miner digs into the mountains in Wyoming, in Colorado, in Nevada, in Alaska, in California, in Hawaii, and brings gold from out of the bowels of the earth. Human endeavor is addressed to that gold so that it is refined, assayed, and valued; and then it is transported across the country at tremendous expense and buried in the ground again in Kentucky. So far as I am able to ascertain, the cost of transporting this gold to Fort Knox has been about $1,078,000.

There are certain things I believe we are sure about in connection with gold. The first one is that it is not going to flow out of the country. The second is that it is going to continue to flow in. The third is based upon the tragic and fruitless experiences of the money doctors in the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury that the desterilizing and the unsterilizing processes whereby it might not be reflected in the excess reserves of the country have proven entirely abortive. Of that we can be sure. So we have on our doorstep today a tremendous problem which indicates breakers ahead, and they may not be so far ahead. When the gentleman from Kentucky spoke of that historic statement, "After us the deluge," it may become more than an academic exclamation.

Here are some things that are certain about the gold that comes into the country. Every time an ounce of gold comes into the country it adds $35 to our deposits. Every time an ounce of gold comes into the country, it adds $35 to the excess reserves of the country. Every time an ounce of gold comes into the country, it emphasizes the fact that interest rates are going to remain so low that there will be no incentive and stimulus to investment capital, with the consequent result that we continue on the basis of a frozen level of unemployment of somewhere between nine and ten million people.

Obviously, if the law of supply and demand still works—and it is one of the laws that they have not undertaken to repeal—it means that the more gold coming in the lower will be the interest rate and the less inducement there will be for stagnant dollars to join in wedlock with idle hands in the country to finally lift this country out of its dislocation.

The next thing is that $35 an ounce in this gold policy stimulates gold production. The production in 1939 was about four times as much as it was in 1929. When finally you make a precious metal like gold so available—and obviously it has an effect in the field of exchange—then there is a disturbance of monetary equilibrium—yet gold comes to the United States. This means that the rest of the countries of the world have about 30 percent of the world supply. When that is exhausted, then what? That is the big problem in which the money doctors are really interested. I said the hoard will grow larger; yes. How can it help but do so? If under present conditions international balances are liquidated in terms of gold and the trade balance favors this country, it means that more gold must come into our Nation. Secondly, the war situation being what it is in foreign countries, timid capital comes to America in the form of gold. This disequilibrium in the sense of uncertainty everywhere in the world today simply means the liquidation of American assets abroad and adds to the amount of gold which we will have, not only now but in the immediate months to come. What are we going to do about it?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. What will happen when we stop buying gold at $35 an ounce?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, the gentleman is quite an authority on this. It is a very engaging subject to anybody who has an interest in the durable and continuing welfare of this country. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN] knows full well what is going to happen. It is like having hold of the tail of a spirited bull calf traveling across the pasture at the rate of 40 miles an hour. When you let go things happen. That is what will happen if we let go of gold. But how are we going to let go? I do not know. I do not pretend to have the answer.

I have expressed my solicitude and my apprehension today, and I wonder whether the monetary doctors who have tinkered with our gold and silver system have the answer whereby we can let go suddenly or progressively and deliver ourselves from the headaches which are to follow. People say so casually once in a while, "But you can embargo the influx of gold." If you follow some sumptuary action of that kind, then what is going to happen? What is going to prevent the other nations of the world from demonetizing their gold? And when it is demonetized you know what will happen. The price will go down maybe $5, $10, or $15 an ounce, perhaps more; while down in a hole in the ground at Fort Knox, Ky., we shall have $18,000,000,000 in gold. The loss will be a painful thing to contemplate.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, when that happens, we will appreciate the loss in no uncertain terms. As a matter of fact, the loss is there now. It is only a question of time until the loss will have to be written on the books, whether by devaluation or through other nations demonetizing their gold. We are headed for a $5,000,000,000 loss on this gold. As a matter of fact, it will be more than that. If we avail ourselves of all the money in the stabilization fund, we will still have a loss of over $5,000,000,000; so that the national debt really will be $45,000,000,000, plus $5,000,000,000, plus $6,000,000,000 of guaranteed bonds, less the recoverables that we at present know nothing about. Therefore the national debt of the country will be $55,000,000,000 rather than $45,000,000,000, less the value of certain assets whose present worth is a bit speculative.

What will be the effect? It will be devastating so far as the venturesomeness of capital, industry, and human ingenuity is concerned. So we get back to the observation of the gentleman from Kentucky, in the terms of Louis XIV, "After us the deluge."

There is $6,000,000,000 more on deposit today in the banks of the country than there was in 1929, and it is the reason that 10,000,000 people are shouting for jobs in this great and resourceful country. [Applause.]

At one time or another there has been an intimation that we should revalue the dollar and restore it to its statutory basis of $20.67 per ounce of gold. However, this would have precisely the effect of incurring a loss running into billions. This loss would wipe out every dollar in the stabilization fund and probably exceed the money in that fund by $5,000,000,000.

Manifestly this is not the way out at a time when we are facing an approximation of the statutory debt limit of $45,000,000,000. I can see another aspect to this problem. If perchance the allied nations should exhaust their gold assets and we become the possessor of all this gold, it might inspire an effort to repeal the Johnson Act which now interdicts loans to those nations that are indebted to us as a result of the last world conflict.

Thus we face the inescapable prospect of an unused and seemingly unusable hoard of gold which is the largest in the history of the world, and holds for us tremendous dangers.

Truly this is our cross of gold.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire, to the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced a bill today which should receive the most serious consideration of the Congress. It is the purpose of this bill to overcome a deficiency in relation to the dealings of inventors with the military establishments of the Government in that:

First. There is no authorized agency in the military departments—War and Navy—that an inventor can approach with a device pertaining to improvements in military equipment established to receive or deal with him as of legal right and not as of grace.

Second. There is no authority in law vested in the Secretary of War, nor in the Secretary of the Navy, which will enable either of them to purchase for the Government a secret, unpatented invention pertaining to national defense out of public funds, the essential value of which resides in its nature as a secret rather than as covered by patent protection.

Third. It is the purpose of the bill to overcome these deficiencies, and enable the Secretary of War and/or the Secretary of the Navy to ascertain, determine, and declare that a secret device relating to national defense is of such military value and consequence that it rises to the dignity of property and for which compensation can be made and paid when it has been thus authoritatively established.

Fourth. It is the further purpose of the bill to establish an organization under the authority of the Secretary of War and/or the Secretary of the Navy to receive and investigate inventions, and report to the respective cabinet members as to the value and acceptability of the device submitted, and also to authorize such an authority to investigate and experiment for the benefit of the military authorities.

I believe that this phase of military preparedness has been neglected and that insufficient encouragement is given to inventors who produce improvements in military equipment, munitions, and matériel. It appears that many developments relating to military equipment have been supplied by civilians outside of the Government service, and many times their experience in approaching the military authorities has frequently been deterrent to progress.

It is further represented that there is no law that will enable the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy to deal with and compensate an inventor of a military device that has not been patented under the patent laws of the United States. This has been decided by the Comptroller General of the United States in several decisions upon the theory that it is incompetent for an administrative officer to spend and distribute public funds, except for the purpose of compromising a valid claim under a patent grant when it would be advantageous to the Government to do so and in such a case the considerations involved are properly reviewable for the Comptroller General of the United States. Very much can be said on the decisions covering cases that have heretofore occurred and been decided, but which are not important at this time.

With this limitation and restriction of law resting upon the Cabinet minister and all subordinate officers, it is obvious that each of them should be authorized to deal with matters of the kind as described, and that is the elementary purpose of the bill.

It is further represented that loyal American citizens are prepared to submit inventions for consideration even without the expectation of compensation, but many of whom have a right to receive compensation for their labors and ingenuity who are unable to find a place in either of the military departments that they can approach authorized to receive them.

Much of the value of a military invention is lost and defeated by its publication as by patent. It is therefore in the best interests of our national defense that I submit my proposal to the Congress. I trust that suitable hearings will be held without delay. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the famous surgeon, Dr. Crawford W. Long, first used ether to reduce pain and suffering 98 years ago. The span of life has been increased by his discovery of ether anesthesia for surgery, and to millions of people in this country and all over the world misery and suffering have been eliminated. He was the greatest benefactor of the human race.

A 2-cent stamp has been issued by the Post Office Department in Dr. Long's honor, and the exercises for the first day sales of the stamp will be held in Jefferson, Ga., on the 8th of this month. The Honorable James A. Farley will make the principal address. This stamp will carry to every American and to all the world the name and picture of the man who first used ether in an operation.

He loved his profession. He once said, "My profession is to me a ministry from God." These words appear upon his statue in the Hall of Fame in this building. He was successful because he felt that he was as much called upon to practice medicine as a minister is to preach the Gospel.

Georgia did herself proud when she placed in the Hall of Fame the statues of her two greatest men, Crawford W. Long and Alexander H. Stephens, and it is rather singular that these two great men should be roommates and honor graduates of the University of Georgia.

Dr. Long's ancestors on both sides were gallant soldiers in the Revolutionary War. His father, James Long, came to Danielsville, Madison County, Ga., which is in the district I have the honor to represent, in 1788 when a mere lad. He owned the first store in the small town of Danielsville. He was the first postmaster there. He was also State senator. He established the first flour mill in the State of Georgia.

His father and the great William H. Crawford were close friends, and Dr. Long was named for this great American. He belonged to the same political party as his classmate, Alexander H. Stephens, and they both were against secession, but afterward, of course, joined the ranks of the Confederacy.

Dr. Long was well educated and refined. He entered Franklin College, now the University of Georgia, when only 14 years old, probably one of the youngest ever to enter the university. He spent 1 year at Lexington, Ky., attending the medical department of Transylvania College. In 1838 he went to Philadelphia and entered the medical department of the University of Philadelphia. After graduation he spent 18 months in the hospitals of New York, and afterward returned to Jefferson, Ga., to practice, and within a short period of time thereafter he used ether in a surgical operation performed on James M. Venable, removing two small tumors situated on the back of his neck. This operation was performed on March 30, 1842.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] such time as he may desire.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, the item on page 9 of the bill making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 1941 carries the amount of $5,831,306. This proposed appropriation is for the purpose of meeting the expenses required for the conduct of special field exercises, including participation therein by the National Guard, Organized Reserves and the Regular Army. Bitter experience has shown that field maneuvers of this character are necessary in order to train both the Regular Establishment and the National Guard in an environment which actually simulates combat conditions. Instructing a national guardsman in the school of the soldier and close-order drill and the elements of military discipline should be given during the winter season in the armories of the various States. These maneuvers are essential to the training of the Regular Establishment, and the National Guard in field work. This field training is absolutely essential to give him the background that enables him to serve effectively when he gets into actual combat.

Brig. Gen. Frank M. Andrews, Assistant Chief of Staff in charge of operations and training, in his testimony before the Subcommittee on Appropriations, stated that the purpose of these maneuvers was as follows:

> In order to develop efficient and well-trained commanders, staffs, and combat units capable of conducting such operations, it is necessary to assemble in the field smaller units into brigade, divisions, corps, and Army units, and conduct combined exercises in which all arms and services participate. Such maneuvers afford opportunities for training commanders and staffs in marching, concentrating, maneuvering, and supplying large units under combat conditions, and for securing vital teamwork between the various elements of these forces. These field exercises afford the most practicable means of testing modern material weapons, equipment, organization, and tactical doctrines and methods.

This is a terse but clear statement of the purposes of these maneuvers and they apply with special force to the National Guard's training.

I am advised that the National Guard Association and the adjutant generals of 42 States have favored this procedure.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS], himself a distinguished soldier, makes the point that these 1940 maneuvers, following the one held last year, would have a devastating effect upon the future enlistments in the National Guard. The gentleman further stated that the resignations of officers might necessarily follow by reason of their difficulty in getting away from their civil employment. He quotes the adjutant general of New York, Major General Haskell, to this effect. It is to be regretted that neither of these gentlemen raised these questions before the Subcommittee on Appropriations. Personally I am confident and I base it on 12 years' service in the guard, that the matter of getting leave from these maneuvers for both officers and men in case their civil employment and means of livelihood is jeopardized can be readily obtained. I think it should be understood on the part of all concerned that where the bread and butter of a man is involved in getting leave for these maneuvers, no difficulty should be imposed or any opprobrium attached to such leave.

The purpose of these 1940 maneuvers is to consolidate effectively the gains made in training in the fiscal year of 1940. By these maneuvers training of the commanders and staffs and both large and small units, and the necessary coordination of all arms make these maneuvers necessary during the next fiscal year. Otherwise the training already received and which is now fresh in the minds of the participants in these maneuvers will be forgotten.

While I am on the subject, may I call attention to the fact that the enlisted officer strength of the Regular Army is 13,350, with an enlisted personnel of 229,303. This is a pitiably small army for a nation of our size, with our coast line. This force is, of course, supplemented by the National Guard of the various States, with an officer strength of 14,472, and an enlisted personnel of 224,338. The Federal Government is appropriating for the purposes of the National Guard an average of $75,000,000 a year. The State appropriation for the National Guard in the fiscal year of 1939 was approximately $12,000,000. It is the judgment of the Chief of Staff and the almost unanimous opinion of the National Guard group that these maneuvers will do no violence to the future enlistments of the Guard, but, on the contrary, will make the citizen soldier self-reliant and able to take care of himself under combat conditions if that time comes.

The eastern corps area maneuvers are to be held in the Watertown-Plattsburg sector in northern New York, where there is an ideal terrain for this performance. The eastern corps area is under the command of Major General Drum, with Brigadier General Phillipson as Chief of Staff. Major General Drum is one of the most distinguished soldiers in the American service. In reading over General Pershing's memoirs the other night, I found several complimentary references to his service in the World War. The people of the United States unfortunately do not come closely in contact with the officers of the Regular Establishment and know little about the work that these splendid officers are doing with the pitifully small funds provided by Congress for the land forces. Both Generals Drum and Phillipson represent the best traditions of the American Army, and in their hands the eastern corps area maneuvers will prove of lasting and permanent benefit to both the Regular Establishment and the National Guard.

I feel confident that the House will leave this appropriation as reported by the committee.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. VREELAND].

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Chairman, I want nothing I may say this afternoon to be considered as critical of the War Department or the Committee on Appropriations. I frankly admit I am not as conversant with the situation in the Regular Army as they. However, I believe in considering the War Department appropriations and our national defense that we give some thought not only to the present but to the future.

The Chief of Staff of the Army yesterday made a statement before the committee to the effect that when the fires in Europe become hot in the summer we had better watch that the sparks do not land in the Western Hemisphere. After all, we are considering a situation that is more serious than just talk.

In dealing with war or considering war I know of no better illustration than that given by General Drum last summer to the troops at the close of the maneuver. He told the story of the Irish lad who had just received his pilot's license and was told by his instructor that he should learn how to bail out in a parachute. When up in the plane they noticed an open spot. The pilot asked him to bail out. He refused. That happened several times. At last they came down, and the pilot said to the Irish lad, "Pat, why didn't you jump?" Pat turned to him and said, "Well, I'll tell you. As I looked over the side of that ship and looked down 5,000 feet I thought to meself, thought I, 'Why practice something you have to be perfect in the first time you try it?'" [Laughter.]

After all, when dealing with a conflict such as is now going on on the other side, we cannot practice. Our standing Army today is a little over 200,000, it is very able, and it is properly officered; but when we consider maneuvers in Europe where they talk of millions of men in the field facing each other, 200,000 men are merely a handful. God forbid that we ever do get into a major emergency, but should we do so who will officer the new Army we must raise from the civilian population?

I believe that under the Army plans the Reserve officers, of whom there are 125,000, will have to take on that job. Where will we get the officers that may be required? Most of the present officers, the older ones, the higher-ranking officers, have come out of the World War or were commissioned shortly after the close of it. The balance of the officers, the younger ones, have come from three sources—from civilian life as specialists, from the R. O. T. C., and from the C. M. T. C. Statistics will show that while the number of men who take the basic course of the C. M. T. C. in the summer is very large, those returning are less than 10 percent, and less than 10 percent of that number go through to commission. Therefore the majority of the officers to handle the new incoming Army when needed will be from the R. O. T. C.

We have colleges throughout the country at the present time that have mighty fine R. O. T. C. units which are doing a very good job, but there are still many, many more colleges in this country which desire to have such a unit. A very good example, in my own district, is Seton Hall College, which

10 years ago had an R. O. T. C. unit, but the United States Army took it away because the college did not have the required and proper facilities. When the unit was taken away it was with the promise that it would be returned when, as, and if the facilities were proper. Seton Hall College on that promise proceeded to do the necessary building and has just completed a $850,000 gymnasium, with offices for the R. O. T. C. officers and instructors, and with ranges and the necessary equipment prescribed by the War Department. Upon application to the War Department we find there are insufficient officers to be sent there for R. O. T. C. duty to train the students in this school. This is one of three-hundred-odd applicant colleges in this country.

We find that the Army is retiring officers daily for disability or various other reasons, such as for age or inability to pass certain physical examinations. I have often wondered why these officers, while they are perhaps not physically capable of entering the field for active duty with troops, cannot be utilized as instructors in the R. O. T. C. units. These men have been trained for years at the expense of this Government; they have done a mighty fine job; and they have years of experience behind them. There is no reason why this world of knowledge they have stored up in their years of training with the Army should be lost forever to the students who could use it today. The boy in college now will be the officer who will have to train our troops in the future. We have a very glaring example of an army without proper officer personnel in Russia, where the experienced officers were purged and replaced by political officers and outmaneuvered by a small, well-officered Finnish force.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VREELAND. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. PLUMLEY. What reason did the War Department give the gentleman as a basis for saying there is an insufficient number of officers to meet the demands made by those institutions at which an R. O. T. C. unit might be established?

Mr. VREELAND. The reason given is that all the officers are needed with the troops under the intense training schedule they have at the present time. [Applause.]

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOLLES].

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Chairman, I have been, like others, greatly disturbed over the future of this Republic. None here proposes the remedy or the answer. What we get is a patchwork. We do not put new glass in the windows when the panes are broken. We stuff them with rags.

We have been tinkering with government for 7 years. The remedies have signally failed. We have suffered the fate of Johnny Smith, and you remember what happened to him:

Four doctors tackled Johnny Smith.
They blistered and they bled him.
With squills and antibilious pills
And ipecac they fed him.
They stirred him up with calomel
And tried to move his liver,
Yet all in vain his little soul
Was wafted o'er the river.

A great many years ago a great orator in this country spoke to an audience in Boston on the question of this Republic, its safety and its foundations. It followed the Civil War, when there was great chaos. This was Phillips Brooks, and I quote at some length from him because what he said at that time is so pertinent today.

The real question everywhere is whether the world, distracted and confused as everybody sees that it is, is going to be patched up and restored to what it used to be, or whether it is going forward into a quite new and different kind of life, whose exact nature nobody can pretend to foretell, but which is to be distinctly new, unlike the life of any age which the world has seen already. Men say, "The world has been disturbed before. Classes have clashed with one another. Governed and governors, employed and employers, rich and poor, have come to blows in other days but things have always adjusted themselves again. The stronger have grown kinder; the weaker have grown humbler; the paternal Governor has grown more fatherly; the obedient subject has grown more filial, and things have gone on again as smoothly as before." "So shall it be again," men say. That is what they expect as the outcome of all this conflict. But other men see clearer. It is impossible that the old conditions, so shaken and broken, can ever be repaired and stand just as they stood before. The time has come when something more than mere repair and restoration of the old is necessary. The old must die and a new must come forth out of its tomb. It is not going to be enough that the strong should once more grow kinder and the weak grow humbler. The balance and distribution of strength and weakness is being altered, must be altered more and more. The sources of artificial strength and artificial weakness are being dried up. Governors and governed, employers and employed are coming to be coworkers for the same ends. Not the old mercies repeated, but new mercies going vastly deeper than the old—these are what men are beginning to see that the world is needing.

Nero, degenerate Emperor of Rome, killed Paul. He ordered him beheaded. They cast the body aside, food for buzzards and dogs. To them that was an end to Paul. True, he had harmed no one; he was not a malefactor, a thief, or a murderer. He was not a brawler nor a roisterer. He stirred up no revolution, incited no mobs, gave proper attention to legal authority, lived simply, almost ascetically. Yet Nero slew him. The seething, moving, groaning, snarling, murmuring, volatile mob of Rome, seeking food for the body and starving for some mystic bread of life, confused by multiplication of gods, portents, signs, and omens, bewildered and distraught by tyrannical edicts, prohibitions, and enslavements, had listened to Paul. They heard of a new life, a life eternal. And so Paul died because so many had listened.

For I am now ready to be offered—

He wrote to his beloved young friend and companion, Timothy, just before he died—and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith.

If this was a sermon, that would be my text, "I have kept the faith." We may not all finish the course; that may not be possible. But we can keep the faith. And if we do not keep the faith, we shall suffer the most terrible of all disasters, moral collapse. Toward that cataclysmic finality we have been moving fast in the past decade. The human being inside is the same one that Paul met in Ephesus, the replica of the seeker for light in Rome.

So we have been seeking the ideal life in America for far more than a century. Like the children of Israel, we have now wandered far away after strange gods. We had an idea founded on fact that this was a republic of individual men and women who slowly, persistently, and successfully fought their way out of struggle into independence. They hewed the way without aid from government or by borrowing a Federal Government's ax to change a forest into a great productive area.

The morale of a great people has been atrophied by a policy of government that insists on supporting them. I was shocked the other day to hear men of high mental caliber on this floor say that if we did not give subsidies to our youth they would go into the criminal life.

That is false. It is slander. How many men on this floor fought their way through school! They were not deterred by menial jobs. They buckled into whatever was there. They sifted ashes and waited on table. They are the ones who grew into places of consequence and realization of what education means. Uncoddled, youth may still fight that battle.

I hear it repeated again and again that this Nation of ours is a democracy, and we talk heatedly on this floor of preserving democracies. Nothing could be more fallacious. We are not now, and never have been, a democracy. This was a republic with a representative law making government. It is not a democracy, but fast growing to be a bureaucracy, and bureaucracy is the right arm of totalitarian government. Russia, under the czars, was for a century the extreme example of a bureaucracy, and Stalin has followed that example.

Perhaps we may get back to a republic after November 1940. We have never been a war like Nation. We have never been a military Nation. Our struggle has been for peace and not for war. Our battle was for arbitration in peace rather than the arbitrament of armed conflict. Our method allows men of different opinions to live together in society. We need no armed force to keep domestic peace.

And we are not at war with any other nation. We have no enemies unless we make them ourselves by our own foolish actions at the other end of the avenue.

And yet we are confronted here with nearly a billion dollars in an appropriation bill for military purposes. If we were at war, were threatened by invasion of our coasts, were mobilizing for defense, or there was even a challenge to our solidarity as a nation, we might be excused by those who will pay the bill for this action. Under the circumstances, as they exist, it is inexcusable. It is less justifiable when we consider our own domestic needs and pressing demands to solve our home problems. The first step in every dictatorship has been to build up a great military establishment. That goes far beyond adequate defense.

Let me quote from Dr. Everett Dean Martin, of California:

> Every totalitarian state is a revolutionary state. It is ruled by a despotism, by a revolutionary dictatorship. Its present government is the result of a conspiracy which has seized power; which rules without constitutional guarantees of human freedom; which has gained its supremacy over its own nation by methods that decent men would not use; which is now seeking to use the same methods to dominate the world, not merely by force, but by rascality and crookedness. This movement works to put decent people everywhere on the defensive by taking advantage of their very decency and love of peace and their disposition to mind their own business.
> These revolutionary governments have tried by propaganda to impose their revolutionary procedure for the last 15 years not only on their own countries, but on all countries. Now they have merely thrown off their masks, and are doing what everybody who carefully studied them knew they would do and must do in order to survive. They have now turned from mere propaganda to the use of military force.

Having exhausted all the wiles of propaganda, the troops are called out.

I want to see these domestic problems attacked. We need action. We need employment consonant with the demand of our people for goods and commodities, and not a pampering of cheap, poverty-on-edge foreign labor. We need a relief program that will pay those aided something beside a starvation wage or dole. We need an old-age pension plan that will keep the cupboard from being bare half the time. We need a farm policy that will not smother the farmer under a load of foreign farm and dairy products. We need about 100,000 employees off the pay rolls. We need a new President who will stop experiments. We need a real foreign policy.

Thank God, we have not yet completely eroded the Constitution. True, we shall never again be the same as in the past. We may not, in 4 years, be able to unscramble the broken eggs of 7 years, but can at least pick out the pieces of shell and get them into the garbage can.

I have faith in America and the American people. If we can halt the marching army of Treasury looters and money grabbers, we will go forward to a new dawn.

When the great Cathedral of St. Paul in London burned there was picked from its ruins a blackened stone on which was in Latin, translated, this: "I shall rise again." And Sir Christopher Wren, under its inspiration, built St. Paul's as it is today, and has stood so for 3 centuries. I submit that as a slogan for the American people in this hour of disturbance "I shall rise again." [Applause.]

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time on this side—11 minutes—to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from North Dakota 4 additional minutes.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what has happened to the Republicans on my side. They all seem to be poetic today. I am at a disadvantage in that respect because I am not a student of poetry. I have browsed around among some of the minor poets of the world, and the only thing I can think of that is appropriate right now is to quote from Shakespeare's Hamlet, where he said:

> The time is out of joint; O cursed spite,
> That ever I was born to set it right!

When we are talking upon the questions before this Congress those of us who are a little bit outspoken on changing the present system are sometimes greatly misunderstood. We have been cataloged as radicals, and sometimes as dangerous characters; but I can say, in speaking for myself, at least, that the only thing I have ever tried to do in this Congress has been to make this Government better, and wherever I find that the Government has erred I am not afraid to speak out and register my protest. We are misunderstood because there is not one of these men of my acquaintance who is not ardently anxious to continue this great experiment of government, and the only way that can be done is to correct the evils as they appear.

I want to speak directly on the war appropriation bill today. I have many times in this House said that in order to be prepared to protect ourselves we must first prepare the people of this country to protect themselves.

With 12,000,000 people out of employment, and I think that number comes closer to it than anybody else's guess, this Congress must recognize that we have a great war problem right here at home. Many speakers today have said that we have surpluses of everything in America. If that is to be taken as literally true, how much more of an indictment it is on the way we have run this Government, to say that we have an abundance of everything and still all of these people out of a job, with nothing to eat, nothing to wear, no place to sleep. I can well remember when I first came to Congress in 1935 that we had a drought in North Dakota and our livestock was starving to death. The Government bought hay to feed that livestock, but thousands and thousands of the livestock died in sight of the haystacks that they could not eat because of red tape on the part of the Government. The stock died and the hay rotted in the yards. Today with an overabundance of everything there should be no people in this country hungry or in distress. It is a case in the country today not of overproduction but of underconsumption. We must do something to put back the normal capacity of the people to consume, and many bills are in this Congress that would do that very thing. I am not so particular about matters of legislation that I can see only one view of the matter. If the bills that I am interested in do not suit the majority, and they have a better plan, I am entirely willing to give way on my special plan and to aid in putting through something that will help the people of this country.

The farm situation in the matter of unemployment represents a terrible condition. It is unnecessary to recount the number of farms that have been foreclosed, and the number about to be foreclosed, or the number of homes that have been lost in America. Suffice it to say that the number of tenants in the United States is increasing alarmingly every year, every week, and every month; and unless we give the people of America homes to fight for, there will not be the spirit to defend this country that there ought to be. I say to you that in normal times the farms of America supply about one-third of all of the jobs of employables in the United States, and when those farms are lost, when they are threatened with foreclosure and the prices obtained for the products do not cover the cost of production, or a decent standard of living, they cannot employ anybody.

The first thing we must do, therefore, if we want this country protected, is to save the remaining farms of America, to see that no more are lost, see that we do not increase the number of sharecroppers and tenants any more than they are now; and we must get back to the land those families who have lost their farms, who want to farm, and who cannot do anything else; and we must find some system in this country, some legislation that will enable these people to go back on the farms and create other farm homes. Also, the sharecroppers and the tenants must have an opportunity to get a home of their own on the soil. When those factors are taken care of, it means that one-third of all of the unemployed people of this country will have potential employment on the farms of America. A lot of people have said that this tenant problem is nothing more or less than the Negro problem in the South. I call attention to the fact that two-thirds of all of the croppers and tenants of the South are not Negroes but are white people, so that it is a problem that affects all.

You will notice in the newspapers every day, if you look at them, that the amount of money on deposit in the banks is increasing right along. We have the greatest amount of bank deposits unused on the books today than at any time in our history. What does that mean? It means that this money is not circulating; it means that the money is stagnant. I do not care what you do with those $17,000,000,000 out in Kentucky. If you bring it in and farm it out under the same system we have today, you will be just as bad off as you are today. In other words, this Government must sometime take control of the Nation's credit and use it for the people. Today that is not being done. The Nation's credit is being given to private banking institutions, and they in turn farm it out to the people at interest rates. The public and private debt in America today amounts to $360,000,000,000.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it not a fact that the money changers have fared better in the last 7 years than ever before in the history of the Republic?

Mr. BURDICK. The gentleman is correct, and the interest on this amount of debt every year equals over $14,000,000,000. Now just think of it. The income of the farmers last year was $7,000,000,000; the income of labor was $7,000,000,000. Add them together, take it all, and you can barely pay the interest on this debt. That is what is losing the homes of this country.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. With a great deal of interest and education, I looked over one of the reports that the gentleman has been commenting on this afternoon, and I hope every Member of the House will read it. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Does the gentleman believe that the farm problem, or whatever you choose to call it, can ever be adequately dealt with in this country until we get around to where the farmer can sell what he produces at the market place, at a reasonable price, and get entirely away from all kinds of Federal subsidies and Federal appropriations?

Mr. BURDICK. I do not think there is a farmer in the United States who wants any Federal subsidy. All he wants is a decent standard of living and an income that will secure that standard. That is all he wants.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And to come to him through the sale of his goods at the market place, independent of all kinds of organizations and appropriations?

Mr. BURDICK. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I am very much interested in the discussion by the gentleman from North Dakota. I want to ask this question: Do you think that the Government subsidies amounting to $3,000,000,000 given to the farmers in the last 6 years for not producing crops which their good land could produce, will ever replace the $11,000,000,000 of gross farm income that the farmer did not receive in the last 7 years as compared with what he received in the 7 years prior to the accession of the New Deal?

Mr. BURDICK. My only answer to that is that the farmers of America were very glad to accept anything they could get from this Congress, and they are still in that position. It is better to receive a little something than to receive nothing at all.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GIFFORD. I am wondering whether the farmer resents so much Government supervision. The inspector showed his card and the farmer had to submit; later when he saw the bull chasing the inspector he called to him and said, "Show the bull your card." Is this indicative of the true feelings of the farmers?

Mr. BURDICK. Well, the only thing I can say is that there is quite a lot of bull in that question. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. I would like to inquire of the gentleman, who is well informed on farm subjects, if he does not believe that the program of subsidies to restrict crop production, plus the idea that we go to other sections of the country and spend millions to bring in other crops, has not worked in spite of seven or eight billion dollars expense, and does he not think that the solution of the whole thing is some kind of a distribution system rather than restricted production?

Mr. BURDICK. I do. I think the gentleman is right on that. I want to say further in answer to your inquiry that I think the Nation as a whole has been benefited by the trade agreements, but that in spots, especially in agriculture, they have taken the worst of it.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Does not the gentleman believe that if the farmer could get even a medium price and could get a market for his products it would stop all necessary subsidies?

Mr. BURDICK. Absolutely; the gentleman is right.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I just wanted to ask a question something similar to the one which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] asked, except that it takes a little different slant. Does not the gentleman believe that the enactment into law of the principles of cost of production will do more good to the American farmer than all the subsidies you can ever give him?

Mr. BURDICK. That is right. I have always been of that opinion.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman if he desires to proceed.

Mr. BURDICK. Go ahead. If I were not interrupted I would not know what to talk about. [Laughter.]

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I just wanted to ask the gentleman this question. I gathered from the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] that one of the reasons why we did not get the better of unemployment was because we did not have a higher interest rate. I would like to ask the gentleman what he thinks about that, particularly with regard to farm loans?

Mr. BURDICK. Anyone who makes a statement in public or private demanding higher interest rates for any group should be examined by some court to find out whether he is safe to be let out or not. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURDICK. May I have 2 more minutes?

Mr. ENGEL. I have no further time on this side.

Mr. BURDICK. I want to indulge on your generosity, Mr. Chairman, to conclude by saying that every time I am speaking in this House and I get interested in the subject myself, the time runs out. [Laughter and applause.]

I. THE PROBLEM

The problems of farm tenancy and landlordism concern themselves with seven groups of insecure farm families:

A. TENANTS

Although in all areas of the United States there are notable instances of desirable relationships between tenants and landlords, tenancy conditions, in many cases and areas, are unsatisfactory to both tenant and landlord, are condemned by both, and are objectionable from the point of view of social welfare.

Tenants still move with some freedom up the agricultural ladder. Yet tenancy in many areas presents serious problems of insecurity, instability of occupancy, and lack of concern with soil conservation.

In the earlier period of our history, the rise to farm ownership was relatively easy. Young farmers remained tenants only a comparatively few years and few failed ultimately to become owners. Today, thousands find the ascent so difficult that more of them each generation get stalled, and remain tenants the rest of their lives. Census figures show that the distribution of farm tenants among age groups has progressively changed to the end that greater and greater percentages are being found in the older-age groups.

Tenancy has increased from 25 percent of all farmers in 1880 to 42 percent in 1935. Because of debt the actual equity of operating owners is far less than these figures indicate. About two-thirds of the tenants and croppers of the United States are located in the South. The problem there, it should be noted, is not a race problem, for of southern tenants and croppers two-thirds are whites, and only one-third are Negroes.

B. CROPPERS

The cropper system prevails principally in the southern cotton and tobacco areas. Croppers operate 716,000 farms, or over 10 percent of all farms in the United States; they constitute 39 percent of all croppers and tenants combined in the South.

Croppers who generally supply only their labor are usually more insecure than tenants. Even the slender protection of the cropper contract has recently become less effective, as conditions have impelled landlords to convert many croppers into laborers, dependent on casual employment for wages. Low standards of living among croppers are in some sections giving rise to unrest.

C. FARM LABORERS

More than one-fourth of all persons gainfully employed in agriculture in 1930 were farm wage laborers. From the standpoint of conditions of employment to which they are subject, they include a number of types.

Perhaps the most secure groups are those who, though hired on a monthly basis, have year-long employment, residing on the farm of the employer. These include, among others, the hired men who live in the homes of their employers and are treated almost as members of the family—apparently a group that has diminished in relative importance.

Probably the great majority of hired farm laborers are dependent on irregular employment. Many move about within one general locality. These include individuals who live on farms and occasionally help neighboring farmers; occupiers of small subsistence units and who depend on casual farm employment for a small and uncertain cash income; and casual workers from towns and cities who migrate to nearby cotton fields, truck or fruit farms to work in seasons of peak labor requirements. In the South families alternately become croppers and hired laborers. There is also a large and apparently increasing number of laborers who migrate long distances from the locality which they regard as home. Such laborers migrate both as individuals and as families. The latter frequently depend upon the wages of men, women, and children to eke out a bare subsistence. Some of them have no permanent abode. They work mainly with intensive crops, such as fruit, sugar beets, and vegetables, following the harvest season from locality to locality.

Some laborers succeed in climbing into the status of tenants or even owners. In depression periods, however, large numbers of tenants and small owners overburdened with debt become migratory laborers. Most farm laborers have uncertainty of employment as their general lot; their earnings and standard of living are correspondingly low. But the situation of the hand laborers in intensive agriculture is especially precarious. The conditions under which they work and live have already promoted strife in widely scattered areas. West of the Mississippi the number of migratory laborers has recently been augmented by farm families from drought areas.

To recapitulate, there may be said to be five groups of farm laborers:

First. Typical hired man, a figure rapidly disappearing from the agricultural scene, as he is being replaced more and more by the seasonal worker and by the use of time- and labor-saving machinery.

Second. Groups of wage workers who are employed on farms hiring two, three, or more laborers.

Third. Woman and child labor, particularly widespread in the sugar-beet and other industries, in which contracts are based on acreage to be harvested rather than on an individual laborer's time.

Fourth. Migratory workers: Hired labor in most sections of the country called in to supplement unpaid family labor, to meet seasonal demands.

Fifth. Gang labor: The "semi-industrialized rural proletariat" working seasonally on large-scale farms in areas of heavy concentration of hired labor.

D. FAMILIES ON SUBMARGINAL LAND

Such families, whether tenants or owners, occupy land incapable, under any system of farming, of maintaining an adequate standard of living. Recent estimates place the number of such farm families at over one-half million of our six and one-half million farmers.

E. FAMILIES ON HOLDINGS OF INADEQUATE SIZE

There are many thousands of families, both owners and tenants, endeavoring to support themselves by full-time farming on holdings insufficient in size to provide an adequate standard of living by any system of farming which will maintain soil fertility. Such families are faced by steady impoverishment. In many cases farms of inadequate size are attributable to the influence of the homestead policies; they are especially numerous in areas, like the Great Plains, where the homestead policies operated most recently. A large number of farm units in the South are also unduly small and could only with difficulty change from a one-crop system to a more secure system of farming.

F. OWNER FAMILIES HOPELESSLY IN DEBT

Thousands of farm owner-operators are burdened with indebtedness contracted for amounts so large, at rates so high, or for terms so short that without alleviation of their conditions they are likely to be forced to become tenants or croppers or join the ranks of migratory farm laborers or casual workers in other employments.

G. FARM YOUNG PEOPLE UNABLE TO OBTAIN FARMS

There are many young people in rural areas who are unable to obtain farms. A considerable proportion of these would migrate to cities if industrial opportunity offered. When that opportunity fails, they remain to increase the pressure on the land and the competition in the lower tenure groups.

H. FARM OWNERS

The farm owner has an important place in the study of farm tenancy. Once a farmer obtains ownership of his property it is essential that he maintain that ownership; it is essential that he stay on the top rung of the agricultural ladder and not descend to the lower rungs, where his presence would further complicate the tenancy situation.

In order to assure maintenance of the tenancy status of the farm owner, it is necessary to assure him credit at low rates of interest, available at times of greatest need, which are likely to be times when least collateral and security are available.

Maintenance of the farm owner as a land owner also may be said to involve the whole agricultural program, parity, soil conservation, acreage adjustment, research, and technical aid.

It must be remembered, however, that less than half—47 percent—of the farmers of the United States own all of the land they farm. Mere maintenance of present farm owners in the owner class will not, therefore, solve the tenancy question.

An additional 10 percent of all farmers are only part owners.

Mr. Chairman, we should not delay the program in this Congress to restore a living chance to the millions who are in distress. I propose to act now—right now—at this session. To complain of this debacle and offer nothing in its place would not be acting honestly either with this Congress or the people at large. I therefore definitely propose a program that is right now before this Congress, the enactment of which will restore self-respect to every citizen in the United States and will cost far less than the pain-killing remedies we have been applying since 1932. Our present state of inaction is not chargeable to any one single party, but to both. The Republicans, as well as the Democrats, are equally responsible. The following bills will do the job. I do not maintain that these are the only bills before Congress that provide a remedy, but I do maintain that these bills, if passed, will be the beginning of a new day in this great Government of ours. These bills are:

House Resolution No. 217, to restore to Congress the sole power to issue money and regulate the value thereof.

H. R. 7600, to eliminate debt money and taxes, set up an honest, scientific monetary system based on the potential productivity of the country, and which shall reflect the needs of the consumers as well as producers.

H. R. 8348, to maintain homes in the United States and provide power to consume goods and provide opportunity for the employment of the idle.

H. R. 9008, 9009, and 9010, covering other crops.

The Townsend Old Age Security Act.

The Jones Farm Credit Act, providing for debt adjustment and refinance of loans.

The Peterson Farm Tenant Act.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS].

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, in the first place I would like to say today that I regret very sincerely I was not on the floor yesterday when the gentleman from Massachusetts made his speech. I tried very hard to get here. It happened that we were having a meeting of the Flood Control Committee which had a bearing on my own section of the country. In spite of the fact that I ran all the way to the floor, I did not get here in time.

The second thing I want to say is that I regret exceedingly to see any Member of the House, least of all one whose ability is as great as that of the gentleman from Illinois, rise on the floor and make a speech predicting dire calamity for the Nation without offering us one shred of suggestion as to what we ought to do about the situation which he thinks is wrong.

I want to point out that the main reason this country has been buying gold is because the country is not ready to import in balance with its exports and because it wants to continue to have a so-called favorable balance of trade. Gold has been pouring in here because we have been selling far more abroad than we bought. I agree the situation is rather ridiculous—exchanging valuable products for gold we do not know what to do with. But I feel sure I have given the reason why it happens. I do not know what the answer to this gold problem is exactly. I do know that the real way to stop the flow of gold is to increase the general level of national prosperity, to solve the unemployment problem, to increase the consumer buying power of this country, so you can afford to import more than you do now without endangering anybody's job. Under those circumstances gold will cease to flow. My own feeling about the matter is that most of the trouble is that the gold we have bought has not been used for the benefit of the people. My main concern is that once the American people have bought and paid for this metal that it has been allowed to lie idle, and, instead of using that metal as a psychological base for credit, we have proceeded with the selling of bonds for bank credit and thus unnecessarily increased the public debt. I am not in favor of any step of return to the gold standard. But I do think it could be used as a base or reserve for national credit, thus saving completely the interest now paid on bonds sold in order to expand buying power in circulation when such action appears necessary.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I know his time is short.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I have 3 minutes, and look at what I am trying to talk about.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The gentleman knows there are $12,000,000,000 of gold certificates out as warehouse receipts against that gold.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I was just going to talk about that; in my judgment, it is a mistake when the Federal Treasury pays for gold that is imported to in turn give a gold certificate to a Federal Reserve bank in equal amount. By law that gold belongs to the people of the United States, yet we issue gold certificates and give them to a private bank. I do not think we should. I think we should issue instead of that certificates of indebtedness of the United States, a note, or something of that sort, but not a gold certificate; and I want to suggest just this one thing to you: The main reason that there has not been a constructive use made of these metals that have been purchased, in my judgment, is because if there were such use made of them, since they belong to the people of America, the whole country would find out how unnecessary it is to base the money of a nation on debt owed to a private banking system.

I know we will continue to hear from the Republican side how our trouble is lack of confidence and how the idle bank reserves are primarily due to that. Well let us see. All through the twenties there was plenty of confidence, I presume. Why? Because consumer buying power was kept up fairly near equal with production. Investment in housing, $11,000,000,000 of consumers' debt, and large foreign loans accomplished this. In 1929 confidence disappeared in spite of the fact that Mr. Hoover was President. Why? Because the bubble of both consumers and foreign debt burst and $8,000,000,000 of bank credit money was withdrawn from circulation. There was not enough buying power.

Confidence began to return in 1933 and things improved. Why? Because consumer buying power was being expanded in line with production, though at the expense of increasing debt. Confidence was very high in September, October, November, and December 1939. Why? The Democrats were still in power then. Yes. But war orders—new buying power—were coming in, so confidence was returning. What happened more recently? Simply that production, under present monetary and distributive system, outruns the buying power in the hands of consumers. It is here the answer to lack of confidence is clearly to be found. A steady market—a stable dollar—these will give confidence I feel sure.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. CANNON.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, with the passage of this bill today, the House and the Committee on Appropriations establishes a record unequaled in any previous Congress. It is the last of the regular annual appropriation bills. The relief bill not yet reported is a legislative bill and is not one of the regular annual appropriation bills. Commencing with the week of January 8, which was the first full week of the present session, the committee has prepared and reported to the House 14 appropriation bills—11 regular annual bills and 3 deficiency or supplemental measures—in this 13-week period. This is one bill better than an average of a bill a week.

This is the best work record the committee has attained since the establishment of the Budget system, commencing with the second session of the Sixty-seventh Congress. The following tabulation shows the dates of reporting the last of the regular annual supply bills to the House at previous comparable sessions of Congress. The tabulation is divided into two periods, the long sessions of the period prior to the change from December to January in the convening date of Congress and the period when all sessions of Congress began in January. In consideration of the dates of the former period it should be remembered that a month's more time was devoted to the bills when Congress convened in December and a month could be added to the reporting dates in order to compare those dates with the reporting dates of the latter period when the session started in January.

An examination of these dates shows that the earliest date upon which the last of the regular bills was reported in the former period was March 17—nine bills. As that session convened in December, a comparable date for present conditions, when the sessions commence in January, would be April 17. The best record of the period following the convening of Congress in January is April 11—nine bills. Comparing these two dates with the record of the present session, April 3—eleven bills—it is apparent that the record of the present session, without reference to the comparative number of bills involved, is better than the best record of the period when sessions began in December by 2 weeks and better than the best record of the period when sessions began in January by 8 days. If allowance is made for the fact that at the present session two more regular annual bills were handled by April 3 than are included in the records of the previous periods, the record of this session is better than the previous records by approximately 4 weeks and 3 weeks, respectively.

Mr. Marcellus C. Sheild, the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, to whose able, efficient cooperation much of the credit for this record is due, supplies the following table of dates upon which the last of the regular annual appropriation bills were reported to the House and the respective dates of adjournment of Congress at that session:

Reporting record of the regular annual appropriation bills since establishment of budget system

Congress and session	Date of reporting the last regular annual appropriation bill to the House	Date of session's adjournment
The following are regular "long" sessions which met on the first Monday in December of the respective years:
67th Cong., 2d sess	Apr. 8 (11 bills)	Sept. 22, 1922
68th Cong., 1st sess	May 24 (9 bills)	June 7, 1924
69th Cong., 1st sess	Mar. 17 (9 bills)	July 3, 1926
70th Cong., 1st sess	Apr. 10 (9 bills)	May 29, 1928
71st Cong., 2d sess	May 7 (9 bills)	July 3, 1930
72d Cong., 1st sess	May 5 (9 bills)	July 16, 1932
The following sessions met in January of each year following the change brought about by the amendment to the Constitution:
73d Cong., 2d sess	Apr. 11 (9 bills)	June 18, 1934
74th Cong., 1st sess	May 13 (9 bills)	Aug. 26, 1935
74th Cong., 2d sess	Apr. 30 (9 bills)	June 20, 1936
75th Cong., 1st sess	June 11 [1] (10 bills)	Aug. 21, 1937
75th Cong., 3d sess	Apr. 18 (10 bills)	June 16, 1938
76th Cong., 1st sess	May 18 [2] (11 bills)	Aug. 5, 1939
76th Cong., 3d sess	Apr. 3 (11 bills)

[1] The number of regular annual bills was increased from 9 to 10 at this session by splitting the War Department appropriation bill into 2 bills—military appropriation bill and War Department civil appropriation bill.

[2] The number of regular annual bills was increased from 10 to 11 by taking the Department of Labor from the State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor appropriation bill and creating a separate bill for it.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Washington, one of the most valuable members of the committee.

Mr. LEAVY. And with the passage of this bill in the amounts provided in the bill, in spite of the fact that we raised the labor social security bill $67,000,000 last week we have cut the pending bill $67,000,000 and the books are still in balance so far as the Budget is concerned and the House is concerned. Is this not a fact?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman has anticipated what I was about to add. As he well says, we have made a record not only in the efficient and expeditious manner in which we have reported the supply bills but also—and what is more important—in economy in the appropriations carried by those bills. The 11 regular appropriation bills, as passed by the House, aggregate $324,158,301 less than the Budget estimates. The 3 deficiency bills passed, $13,231,375 below the Budget, a total saving in the 14 bills of $337,389,676, the largest reduction in Budget estimates since the first year after the Budget system was inaugurated, and the best record, considered as a whole, in the history of congressional appropriations.

I might add that the pending relief bill concludes the appropriation program for the session, and the House is ready to adjourn on short notice. If the other body will emulate the excellent example set by the House this Congress will establish a notable record for economy, and adjournment can be taken at an early date. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, salaries, War Department, $6,258,188: Provided, That the number of warrant officers and enlisted men on duty in the offices of the Chiefs of Ordnance, Engineers, Coast Artillery, Field Artillery, Cavalry, Infantry, and Chaplains on March 5, 1934, shall not be increased, and in lieu of warrant officers and enlisted men whose services in such offices shall have been terminated for any cause prior to July 1, 1941, their places may be filled by civilians, for the pay of whom, in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, the appropriation "Pay of the Army" shall be available.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words in order to make an observation in answer to my good friends the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK] and the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS]. I am very fond of the gentleman from North Dakota, but I appreciate, of course, that sometimes his logic is very thin and tenuous, indeed, particularly when he seeks to dismiss an argument by saying that somebody ought to have his head examined, if he happens to be in favor of increased interest rates. It is not for me or any other individual to say what interest rates shall be or to wish them up or down. It is for the inexorable logic of the economic conditions of this country to determine what they will be and what the flow of capital will be as a result.

Now, answering my good friend the gentleman from California as to what the effect will be on the economy of the country, let me submit some figures. Here is a table released by the Securities and Exchange Commission dated April 4, 1940. This is table 4, relative to financings which became effective in February of 1940. Now, get this: New money, $17,124,000. Refundings, $196,000,000.

This $196,000,000 is for the purpose of taking up outstanding bond issues and existing stock issues, but only $17,000,000 have gone into new financings for capital plant expansion in the country, which is translated into terms of jobs for the idle hands of the country. That is the answer, I may say, to my California friend, and it is not for him or me to say what the interest rate shall be.

When it comes to the question of interest rates, how strange it is that all the responsible farm organizations have expressed themselves in opposition to some of the provisions of the pending Jones-Wheeler bill relating to the recasting of farm credit and farm financing. Why? For the simple reason they know that the private sources of farm credit may be destroyed and the discerning farmers of the country know it. That is the answer to my friend from California and my friend from North Dakota.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. The gentleman spoke of the law of supply and demand awhile ago. Does he not believe that money and credit, like other things, ought to find their return in accordance with the law of supply, and if you have a superabundance of money and credit, that the interest rate should thereby be low?

Mr. DIRKSEN. In view of that observation, will the gentleman tell me why his administration is tinkering around with gold and filling the country with excess reserves and deposits, which has a tendency to lower the interest rate on investment capital, with the result that the investment dollars go into storm cellars and stay there? Idle dollars in turn make idle hands.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. The lower the rate of interest on bonds, the less likelihood there is of people investing in bonds. The difference between the amount of return that one can get from a substantial investment on the one hand and an investment in bonds is the deciding factor as to which he will put his money into in all likelihood.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The S. E. C. report shows $17,000,000 in new investment money, which is probably less than 10 percent of what they were in normal times, or perhaps 5 percent. Where is the answer? The gentleman should find it in view of that fact.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I made a speech the other day on that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman should study the subject of gold imports and its effect on the economy of this country.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. Does not the gentleman and the House understand that the rate of interest is dependent upon the demand for money?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Definitely.

Mr. TABER. And that the demand for money is dependent upon the degree of operation of business, and the degree of operation of business is dependent upon the confidence that the country has, and in view of the lack of confidence we have had in the last 7 years, the rate of interest has naturally gone down.

Mr. DIRKSEN. When there is no profit to be made, there is no demand for money.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, as a Member of the House of Representatives, it is very interesting to sit here and listen to the discussions that take place in reference to money. I wish that some Members of the House who undertake to discuss money and finances would take into consideration the provisions of economic law. I think it is well understood by all people who know anything about money that the interest rate reflects the business conditions of the country. When business is profitable, people can borrow money and afford to pay higher interest rates. Consequently, when there is a demand for money, the rate of interest goes up. When there is no profit to be had in business, nobody can afford to borrow money. You cannot afford to borrow money at 1 percent if you cannot make a profit and you lose by the operation. It is axiomatic that the low rate of interest indicates a scarcity of money and a deficiency of credit. Of course, there are other factors that enter into the control of interest rates, one of which is the opportunity to invest in Government bonds. This Government has set up the greatest reservoir ever constructed for the storage of wealth out of the reach of taxation. We have created the great Reconstruction Finance Corporation as a supplemental agency to our banking system—created to do the work that a bank ought to do. Until recent times we financed the development of this country through the functions of the banking system, but now we find our banking system has failed and we must set up another agency—the Reconstruction Finance Corporation—to support business and the needs of business—to be financed by money gained from the sale of tax-exempt bonds. This agency is absorbing more and more the investment money of this country into tax-exempt securities and forcing business to turn more and more to the Government for the money with which to function.

Let me call the attention of our learned friend from the great State of New York to the fact that when business is profitable people can afford to borrow money and pay a good rate of interest. As business prospers the rate of interest goes up. We are predicating all our legislation here, however, in fixing a low rate of interest on loans to farmers and others, on the proposition that we will always be in a depressed business condition in this country and that there will be no adequate volume of money with which to do business, so we must fix this low rate of interest.

Mr. Chairman, if we ever have prosperous business conditions in this country, normal conditions, you will find that the market for Government bonds will fail and the price will go down just as it did in 1920, when we saw Government bonds go to 80 and yield 6 percent on the investment. I agree with the gentleman that we are on dangerous ground and that we must take into consideration the forces of economic law and pass legislation to that end. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I have not made a point of order against the pro forma amendments our so-called monetary experts have been offering, but I shall be constrained in the future to make that point of order, and I suggest gentlemen confine their amendments to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of the Army War College, being for the purchase of the necessary special stationery; textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, newspapers, and periodicals; maps; police utensils; employment of temporary, technical, or special services, and expenses of special lectures; pay of employees; and for all other absolutely necessary expenses, $80,664.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee a question with regard to the program for the training of Negro pilots.

Mr. SNYDER. I went into this question at the beginning of the consideration of the bill this afternoon with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Mr. DIRKSEN. After examining the testimony of Mr. Brown before the committee, and also the testimony of the Department, it occurs to me that the War Department is not carrying out the intent of the Congress as recited in Public, No. 18, and probably is not giving the potential Negro pilot equitable consideration. Is my understanding correct that they refuse to enlist them in the Air Corps at this school at Glenview, near Chicago?

Mr. SNYDER. Thus far there has been no occasion to enlist them. The Civil Aeronautics Authority, in conjunction with the War Department, has worked out a plan to train Negro pilots, mechanics, engineers, and so forth, and has established a school near Chicago that is in operation at the present time. When the school has trained a sufficient number of students to warrant the creation of a special unit, I am advised that the War Department will then take such steps as may be necessary looking to the utilization of this additional trained personnel.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Has the gentleman any idea when that will be?

Mr. SNYDER. I should think in the very near future. These civilian schools throughout the country are turning out pilots in from 6 months to a year. You must realize that they did not get started on this training until about 6 months after the bill was passed last year.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Civil Aeronautics Authority has done its duty in designating the schools. It occurs to me that it is the War Department's duty to articulate that program.

Mr. SNYDER. The War Department has cooperated and is cooperating. It has given them all the necessary equipment and every possible assistance to carry out the training program.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of not to exceed an average of 13,796 commissioned officers, $38,055,754; pay of officers, National Guard, $100; pay of warrant officers, $1,351,248; aviation increase to commissioned and warrant officers of the Army, including not to exceed 86 medical officers, $3,242,593, none of which shall be available for increased pay for making aerial flights by nonflying officers at a rate in excess of $720 per annum, which shall be the legal maximum rate as to such officers, and such nonflying officers shall be entitled to such rate of increase by performing three or more flights within each 90-day period, pursuant to orders of competent authority, without regard to the duration of such flight or flights; additional pay to officers for length of service, $10,546,818; pay of an average of not to exceed 220,969 enlisted men of the line and staff, not including the Philippine Scouts, $103,451,160; Regular Army Reserve, $1,119,816; pay of enlisted men of National Guard, $100; aviation increase to enlisted men of the Army, $1,819,100; pay of enlisted men of the Philippine Scouts, $1,050,447; additional pay for length of service to enlisted men, $8,275,725; pay of commissioned officers on the retired list, $12,850,930; pay of retired warrant officers and retired members of the Army Nurse Corps, $1,441,086; increased pay to not to exceed 308 retired officers on active duty, $394,960; pay of retired enlisted men, $13,930,512; pay of not to exceed 60 civil-service messengers at not to exceed $1,200 each at headquarters of the several Territorial departments, corps areas, Army and corps headquarters, Territorial districts, tactical divisions and brigades, service schools, camps, and ports of embarkation and debarkation, $72,000; pay and allowances of contract surgeons, $40,656; pay of nurses, $1,137,820; rental allowances, including allowances for quarters for enlisted men on duty where public quarters are not available, $11,369,365; subsistence allowances, $7,200,642; interest on soldiers' deposits, $70,000; payment of exchange by officers serving in foreign countries and when specially authorized by the Secretary of War, by officers disbursing funds pertaining to the War Department, when serving in Alaska, and all foreign money received shall be charged to and paid out by disbursing officers of the Army at the legal valuation fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, $100; in all, $217,420,932, of which amount $1,000,000 shall be available immediately; and the money herein appropriated for "Pay of the Army" shall be accounted for as one fund: Provided, That during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, no officer of the Army shall be entitled to receive an addition to his pay in consequence of the provisions of the act approved May 11, 1908 (10 U. S. C. 803): Provided further, That no part of this or any other appropriation contained in this act shall be available for the pay of any person, civil or military, not a citizen of the United States, unless in the employ of the Government or in a pay status on July 1, 1937, under appropriations for the War Department, nor for the pay of any such person beyond the period of enlistment or termination of employment, but nothing herein shall be construed as applying to instructors of foreign languages at the Military Academy, or to Filipinos in the Army Transport Service, or to persons employed outside of the continental limits of the United States except enlisted men of the Regular Army, other than Philippine Scouts, upon expiration of enlistment, and this provision shall be subject to the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the protection of certain enlisted men of the Army," approved August 19, 1937: Provided further, That without deposit to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States and withdrawal on money requisitions, receipts of public moneys from sales or other sources by officers of the Army on disbursing duty and charged in their official accounts, except receipts to be credited to river and harbor and flood-control appropriations and retirement deductions, may be used by them as required for current expenditures, all necessary bookkeeping adjustments of appropriations, funds, and accounts to be made in the settlement of their disbursing accounts.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. SNYDER: On page 11, line 10, strike out "seven hundred and ninety-six" and insert "eight hundred and thirty-one."

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the chairman of the subcommittee tell us why this amendment is necessary?

Mr. SNYDER. May I say to the gentleman from New Jersey that the money is in the bill to cover the payment of these officers, but we just neglected to include 35 of them in the number of officers for the pay of whom the bill provides.

Mr. POWERS. Why not reduce the amount of money? Why increase the number of officers? What is behind it?

Mr. SNYDER. We approved the number of officers in the committee. This is just a mistake in the writing of the bill.

Mr. POWERS. It is a misprint?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Toward the acquisition of land, as authorized by the act of July 26, 1939 (53 Stat. 1123), as follows: Fort Bliss, Tex. (estimated to cost $800,000), $500,000; Fort Knox, Ky. (estimated to cost $1,640,000), $1,000,000; Fort Meade, S. Dak., $30,720; Fort Dix, N. J., $21,000; in all, $1,551,720, to remain available until July 1, 1942.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky: Page 30, strike out all of line 3, and in line 4, strike out "$1,000,000", and correct the total in line 5.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I shall not speak if the gentleman will accept the amendment.

Mr. POWERS. Does the chairman of the subcommittee indicate that the gentleman from Kentucky makes million-dollar speeches?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire recognition on the amendment?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, my amendment strikes out the $1,000,000 proposed on page 30, lines 3 and 4, for the acquisition of 52,000 acres of additional land for Fort Knox. This land is estimated to cost $1,640,000. I offer this amendment because my colleague, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CREAL], says this appropriation is unnecessary. The Budget did not ask for this money and the President did not ask for it; nevertheless, it is included in this bill. As far as I can understand, there have been no hearings on this matter.

This provision is unnecessary. What will it do? Why, it will take one-fourth of Meade County in Kentucky, about 500 farms, mostly of good land, and it will destroy the road systems. In that area there is an R. E. A. project which when completed will cost $185,000. It will take a great many churches and schools, villages, and cut people in the other part of the county off from their connection with the bridge on the Ohio River and to Louisville, their market. This is a very small county in Kentucky, and this little county is bonded for $136,000, and this bill proposes to take from them and turn over to the Government, when it has not been recommended by the Budget or the President, more than 52,000 acres. It will take away about $18,000 in taxes from this county annually. So I trust that my amendment will prevail and we may save here $1,640,000. There at least should be time for hearings.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. STEFAN. I will support the gentleman's amendment for the reason that, if you do not want to give the Army the land for this purpose, we in Nebraska have a tremendous amount of land which has been recommended by high and efficient Army officers for purposes similar to this, and the land is available at, perhaps, a little less money.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I cannot understand why this appropriation of $1,000,000 was put in here as the initial step toward a larger appropriation when the Budget did not ask for it, the President did not ask for it, and we already have a great area there at Fort Knox of over 30,000 acres, and yet we are proposing to add 52,000 acres more.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. PEARSON. Was any showing made before the Committee on Appropriations giving any reasons for this appropriation?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I know of none. No hearings were held. The people of Meade County had no opportunity to be heard. With the big deficit and debt facing us, why put this in?

Mr. PEARSON. Is there to be any additional safety?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I understood from the good Congressman who represents that district, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CREAL], that no showing has been made, and he or I would offer the amendment and I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CREAL].

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I suppose the gentleman knows that I am quite familiar with the situation at Fort Knox myself, as I have visited it three or four times a year for the last 3 or 4 years.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I have visited it for a number of years and was pleased.

Mr. MAY. And the gentleman knows they are so badly restricted for land now that they can hardly operate there for maneuver purposes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. No. I do not know that. Why did not the Army ask for it from the Budget, and why did not the Budget ask for it, and why did not the President ask for it?

Mr. MAY. I do not have to answer that question from the gentleman. He has been in Congress as long as I have and the gentleman knows that the Budget controls in such matters, and the Army is not permitted to tell the Committee anything on earth except what they are told.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. We have here the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CREAL] who has been around for the last 20 years or more, and he says the appropriation is not necessary. If we are going to spend the taxpayers' money let us know this is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MAY) there were—ayes 43, noes 29.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Those in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.]

Seven Members have risen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

Mr. O'NEAL. Mr. Chairman, may I respectfully request by unanimous consent that the count be taken again? There were more than seven standing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair counted those who rose after the Chair had announced that those in favor of tellers should stand, and the Chair distinctly observed only seven, and, therefore, the Chair refuses again to submit the request.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the procurement, maintenance, and issue, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, to institutions at which one or more units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps are maintained, of such public animals, means of transportation, supplies, tentage, equipment, and uniforms as he may deem necessary, including cleaning and luandering of uniforms and clothing at camps; and to forage, at the expense of the United States, public animals so issued, and to pay commutation in lieu of uniforms at a rate to be fixed annually by the Secretary of War; for transporting said animals and other authorized supplies and equipment from place of issue to the several institutions and training camps and return of same to place of issue when necessary; for purchase of training manuals, including Government publications and blank forms; for the establishment and maintenance of camps for the further practical instruction of the members of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and for transporting members of such corps to and from such camps, and to subsist them while traveling to and from such camps and while remaining therein so far as appropriations will permit, or, in lieu of transporting them to and from such camps and subsisting them while en route, to pay them travel allowance at the rate of 5 cents per mile for the distance by the shortest usually traveled route from the places from which they are authorized to proceed to the camp and for the return travel thereto, and to pay the return travel pay in advance of the actual performance of the travel; for expenses incident to the use, including upkeep and depreciation costs, of supplies, equipment, and matériel furnished in accordance with law from stocks under the control of the War Department; for pay for students attending advanced camps at the rate prescribed for soldiers of the seventh grade of the Regular Army; for the payment of commutation of subsistence to members of the senior division of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, at a rate not exceeding the cost of the garrison ration prescribed for the Army, as authorized in the act approved June 3, 1916, as amended by the act approved June 4, 1920 (10 U. S. C. 387); for the medical and hospital treatment of members of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, who suffer personal injury or contract disease in line of duty, and for other expenses in connection therewith, including pay and allowances, subsistence, transportation, and burial expenses, as authorized by the act of June 15, 1936 (49 Stat. 1507); for mileage, traveling expenses, or transportation, for transportation of dependents, and for packing and transportation of baggage, as authorized by law, for officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Regular Army traveling on duty pertaining to or on detail to or relief from duty with the Reserve Officers' Training Corps; for the purchase, maintentnce, repair, and operation of motor vehicles, including station wagons, $4,931,417, of which amount $400,000 shall be available immediately: Provided, That the Secretary of War is authorized to issue, without charge, in lieu of purchase, for the use of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, so many horses now belonging to the Regular Army as he may consider desirable: Provided, That uniforms and other equipment or material issued to the Reserve Officers' Training Corps in accordance with law shall be furnished from surplus stocks of the War Department without payment from this appropriation, except for actual expense incurred in the manufacture or issue: Provided further, That in no case shall the amount paid from this appropriation for uniforms, equipment, or material furnished to the Reserve Officers' Training Corps from stocks under the control of the War Department be in excess of the price current at the time the issue is made: Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used for the organization or maintenance of an additional number of mounted, motor transport, or tank units in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps in excess of the number in existence on January 1, 1928: Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated in this act shall be available for any expense on account of any student in Air Corps, Dental Corps, or Veterinary units not a member of such units on May 5, 1932, but such stoppage of further enrollments shall not interfere with the maintenance of existing units: Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated elsewhere in this act, except for printing and binding and pay and allowances of officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, shall be used for expenses in connection with the Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I feel it is necessary, in view of testimony offered regarding the Reserve Corps, that something be said about units operating in the various schools and colleges of the country under section 55–C of the national defense, as amended. Under that bill the Secretary of War can provide equipment and that sort of thing to high schools, military academies, and schools and colleges. Today there are 365 such units in probably 275 schools. I am sure that every Member of the House has at some time or other been under the importunities of the schools in his area relative to applications for junior and senior units in the schools which cannot be available at the present time. I took the trouble to go into the matter rather thoroughly, both with the War Department and elsewhere, and I find 108 junior applications and 49 senior applications, covering 29,000 young men in schools for whom they would like to have this training. The cost would not be a great deal and I am amazed to find that it would be less than $10 per capita. To take in the additional 108 junior units and 49 senior units initial cost would be $900,000 for the first year, and approximately $275,000 in maintenance cost per year thereafter. The difficulty seems to be with the instructor personnel to expand that program and take on other applications. I am informed that the instructor personnel at the present time is very much overworked, and they are trying to induce some of the retired officers to come back into the Service for the purpose of Reserve officers training work, so that if there were an expansion of this program and all applications pending approved, there still would not be sufficient officer material to provide instruction. That seems to be the situation. My first impulse was to offer an amendment to increase the amount carried in the bill by $900,000, so that we could take care of the 156 applications now pending, but if sufficiently informed officer-instructor personnel is not available for the purpose, then obviously any amount of money that might be added to the bill would be of no avail at the present time. I make that statement because I think other Members have applications on file, no doubt, in the War Department, and that is the situation that exists today. I am willing to forego the opportunity to try to add another $900,000 to the bill, but even if that were done, it still would not make available that training to many of the schools.

General Marshall, Chief of Staff, and Major Ostrander both testified before the committee at some length concerning this program.

It was pointed out that provision was being made to induce 300 officers on retired status to resume active duty for the purpose of R. O. T. C. instruction. I am advised, however, that of this number, not more than 60 percent might qualify physically and that the 180 officers who would be available, would be only enough to carry the load for the schools which now have training units.

I also explored the possibility of assigning warrant officers or noncommissioned personnel to high schools for the purpose of this instruction. I have been advised that for a number of reasons this does not work out satisfactorily and that the Department is most reluctant to expand the program if it must be done with noncommissioned personnel.

In view of this situation the problem is not one of additional funds but of officer shortage and until this is remedied, extra funds, though made available, would not serve the purpose of expanding this training program during the fiscal year 1941.

I have a very abiding interest in the matter because an application from my own district is now pending before the War Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop watch, or other time-measuring device, a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premiums or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, Edgewood Arsenal and the Edgewood Chemical Warfare Depot are both located within the military reservation on Gunpowder Neck in Harford County, Md., but are two separate and distinct installations. It is a source of real gratification to me, not only because I represent the district which houses these important and interesting activities but because they present the only establishment of their kind and are so vital therefore to our Atlantic coast States, as well as the country at large, to find the bill now before us—the War Department appropriations bill, providing, first, for the sum of $854,990 for the Chemical Warfare Service, Army, fiscal year 1941, and specifically for project 21, Reserve chemical and filling plants, and, also, $918,988 for the fiscal year 1941, for the construction of buildings, utilities, and appurtenances at military posts, specifically under project 1 (i): Edgewood Arsenal, Md., Bush River project.

I congratulate the members of the subcommittee for their decision in this respect.

In partial explanation of the reasons for the appropriations and the effect thereon, I quote at this point from the testimony of Gen. G. C. Marshall, Chief of Staff, page 24 of the hearings:

The estimates carry $918,918 which will be employed largely for the construction of magazines for the proper housing of ammunition, powder, and explosives now stored in deteriorated warehouses which are located within a few hundred yards of the quarters of personnel stationed at Edgewood and at Fort Hoyle. These conditions endanger the lives of personnel and also of plant and equipment valued at $30,000,000. The present storage situation grew up following the World War and was in the nature of necessity due to the nonavailability of other buildings in which to store munitions on hand at Edgewood Arsenal when World War activities at that arsenal ceased. The conditions that now exist and have existed since the World War violate all safety standards and should not be continued. As stated previously, they present a distinct hazard to life and property.

This project is part of the $1,114,000 authorized for the Bush River project by the act approved June 4, 1936. Funds for the accomplishment of this project were requested in the estimates for the fiscal year 1938 and were disallowed by your committee, its report containing a statement substantially as follows:

"The committee feel that there is justification for the construction only in the event the policy is to have all chemical warfare manufacture and the great bulk of the storage in the United States concentrated in one establishment. Concentration has its virtues, but as to this particular activity the estimate raises the question as to whether or not it is wise to have all eggs in one basket. It is believed that the matter is one which should be restudied by the War Department and the Military Affairs Committee."

The question has been restudied by the War Department with the conclusion that the rounding out of Edgewood Arsenal constitutes the most economical plan for solving a difficult situation in the present emergency. To complete the proper rounding out of this arsenal will require new construction for which no authorization exists. The Chemical Warfare Service cannot properly perform its mission with the facilities that now exist, and the completion of the required installations at this plant can be managed at an estimated cost of not to exceed $5,500,000.

An additional chemical warfare arsenal should be located in the interior, but provision should first be made to facilitate business at Edgewood. The estimated cost of a new arsenal of equivalent capacity to Edgewood is $20,000,000, exclusive of the cost of land. The requirements of a suitable inland site with adequate safety zones would total 80,000 acres which would require a considerable additional expenditure. If Edgewood were abandoned and a new depot established it would cost approximately $5,000,000 to move the stocks now at Edgewood. This sum approximates the amount necessary to round out the existing arsenal on a minimum operating basis.

The testimony of Maj. Gen. Walter C. Baker, Chief, Chemical Warfare Service, accompanied by Col. Arthur M. Heritage, Lt. Col. Paul X. English, and Capt. Norman D. Gillet, Chemical Warfare Service, at pages 434 and 435 of the hearings, is of such interest that I quote therefrom:

General BAKER. The Chemical Warfare Service is, in general, responsible for the training of the Army in defense against chemical warfare, and the supply of the necessary munitions and equipment for this purpose; conducting the necessary research and development to insure that the Army will have available the most efficient defensive and offensive material and equipment; with the operation of manufacturing facilities for the supply, not only of material needed in current operation and training, but also the accumulation, insofar as funds are available, of an adequate war reserve.

This service is also responsible within its field for the necessary advance planning for the procurement of supplies and equipment in time of emergency, either by expansion of Government-operated facilities or by procurement from industry. Thus, our activities may be classified as: (1) Research, (2) manufacture, (3) training, and (4) procurement planning.

While the carrying out of these functions affects the Army as a whole, and we must maintain our officers in all the corps areas in the continental United States and in our overseas departments, the majority of our work is centered at Edgewood Arsenal, approximately 20 miles north of Baltimore, where we maintain our only arsenal, at which all activities in connection with research and manufacture are carried out. Thus the greater portion of the funds covered in the estimates we are considering will be expended at Edgewood Arsenal, either for direct manufacturing and research activities or for the operation of the Chemical Warfare School and carrying out of our current procurement activities with industry. We also maintain five Chemical Warfare procurement district offices which are constantly in touch with industry in connection with procurement planning activities.

The estimates for the fiscal year 1941 total $6,260,382. Included in this total is a contract authorization of $740,000, appropriated under the Second Deficiency Act, fiscal year 1939, for the procurement of gas masks. * * * The other notable increases are for the rehabilitation of certain essential plants at Edgewood Arsenal, Md., totaling $854,990, and a procurement planning project for the procurement of gages, dies, jigs, and special machinery for manufacture, totaling $1,893,615, together with the necessity therefor.

Mr. SNYDER. We had quite an extended discussion here the other day, when the Quartermaster General was here, upon the subject of additional storage at Edgewood Arsenal. Colonel English was here at that time and made a very forceful presentation. Would you care to express your views upon that matter?

General BAKER. I wish to endorse everything Colonel English said because he knows thoroughly what my views are.

I think the question of adequate storage at the Edgewood Chemical Warfare Depot for reserve stocks and for the current issue stocks of various types of munitions is extremely important not only for the care of the property concerned but also in order that its storage may comply with safety regulations in order to afford adequate protection to human lives.

We have a great deal of very valuable property stored there, which is impossible of segregation in accordance with the best practice, and unless we have some means of properly storing munitions and supplies which constitute a hazard we are in constant danger of having trouble.

Mr. SNYDER. I take it that to the extent facilities exist for its accommodation, you have this explosive material stored already in strategic areas in the United States, in Panama, and in the insular possessions. Would that be true?

General BAKER. A very limited quantity. Our principal storage is at the Edgewood Chemical Warfare Depot. That is the only depot we have in continental United States.

Mr. SNYDER. It is the policy to retain reserves at Edgewood for dispatch from there as and where needed?

General BAKER. As it is called for we send it out as needed, current supplies as well as reserve supplies. That is the policy now. In case of an emergency, as facilities become available in general depots, we will place the material at locations more convenient to possible points of use.

Mr. SNYDER. This accumulation at Edgewood may be said to be reserve quantities?

General BAKER. That is correct. It also includes items in current use.

Mr. SNYDER. Has this storage situation been brought about in any way by reason of the occupance of space by material of questionable value or really of no particular value?

General BAKER. No, sir.

Mr. SNYDER. How much high-explosive storage is presently available which is appropriately dispersed?

Colonel ENGLISH. There is none appropriately dispersed.

Mr. SNYDER. Is any considerable part of this material of a nature which readily could be procured from industry in the event of an emergency? In other words, are you storing up supplies beyond reasonably potential immediate needs?

General BAKER. No, sir; none of our supplies and materials stored at the Edgewood Chemical Warfare Depot are commercial type.

Mr. COLLINS. General, it develops that we have about $30,000,000 invested at Edgewood, and these investments were made during the last war, principally. Since then conditions have arisen because of which improvements should be made in this plant, and since the war we have learned also how to store ammunition of various types and in a way we did not know at the time this plant was built.

I was a member of the joint committee on the Army and the Navy which had ammunition storage under consideration, and we developed the igloo type of storage, or at least that was presented to us.

What you are proposing, as I understand it, is to improve your facilities at Edgewood and also to provide a better way of storing this ammunition, not only a better way in the sense of protecting it, but also to protect the lives and property of the people in that particular section of the country. In general, that is what you propose.

As I understand it, the principal argument that is made against these proposals is that a plant of this particular nature ought to be located somewhere farther away from the coast than the Edgewood

Arsenal, that it ought to be located, for instance, in the chairman's congressional district, or in the congressional district of my friend from Arkansas, or in South Dakota, or in my congressional district. Of course, I would like to see it located in my district, but I know it is not going to be, and for that reason I am not going to try to get it located in my district.

But as long as we have the plant which is located at Edgewood, you think that plant ought to be improved and the storage facilities increased; that is your idea, is it not?

General BAKER. That is correct, Mr. COLLINS. We need additional plant facilities for the arsenal, and safe storage facilities at the Edgewood Chemical Warfare Depot.

Mr. COLLINS. Suppose we were to decide that we ought to have another plant; as I understand it, it would be 3 or 4 years before such a plant could be built and the machinery installed in it; is not that true?

General BAKER. It would take considerable time. I would estimate a minimum from 1 year to 18 months to complete after contracts were approved.

Mr. COLLINS. And during the next 3 or 4 years we would have this stuff inadequately stored, and the lives and property of people would be jeopardized.

Furthermore, as I understand it, we ought to have this particular plant improved at the present time so we can avail ourselves of that plant while a new one is established, if Congress, in its wisdom, sees fit to establish it; that is so, is it not?

General BAKER. That is my idea, Mr. COLLINS.

Mr. COLLINS. Looking at the map, Edgewood is on the Chesapeake Bay, is it not?

General BAKER. It is on Gunpowder Neck, which is a long peninsula extending into Chesapeake Bay for 7 or 8 miles.

Mr. COLLINS. It is not located on the Atlantic Ocean, as a great many people believe it is?

General BAKER. No; it is not.

Mr. COLLINS. And in order to get from the sea with a hostile airplane you would have to go entirely across the State of Delaware and entirely across the State of New Jersey, would you not?

General BAKER. And a part of Maryland.

Mr. COLLINS. So, as a military man, do you think it is relatively safe from attack by foreign countries?

General BAKER. That depends on a number of factors.

Mr. COLLINS. I know, but we know what the factors are. Do you not think it is relatively safe?

General BAKER. Yes; relatively so.

Mr. COLLINS. It is just as safe as any other place 100 or 150 miles inland, is it not?

General BAKER. It is just as safe as other places equally distant from the sea.

Mr. COLLINS. In any event, you would have to store these supplies, if we had a war, somewhere in the eastern section of the country, because if we were going to ship them to our troops, especially if they are stationed abroad——

General BAKER. They should be near the means of transportation in order to ship them wherever the theater of operations happened to be.

Mr. COLLINS. You would, of necessity, have to have them stored some place in the East?

General BAKER. Some place in the East, preferably near the point of manufacture, so they could be shipped with the least loss of time and amount of congestion.

Mr. COLLINS. Under all these circumstances I have talked about, do you see any good reason why this plant should be abandoned and another one established somewhere in the East?

General BAKER. No, sir; I do not think Edgewood should be abandoned under any circumstances. As you have stated, we have a large institution there as the result of the establishment of the plant during the World War, and we have endeavored to keep it up as far as we could with appropriations that have been made since then. I do think it should be built up to the point where it will take care at least of the requirements for the initial protective force and be able to maintain that force in the field.

Mr. COLLINS. You would have no objection to the establishment of another plant similar to this plant somewhere in the United States, would you?

General BAKER. Decidedly not; in fact, I advocate it, and of greater capacity, because what is planned for Edgewood is a plant of minimum capacity. I think a plant with any additional capacity should be, and I strongly recommend that it be at some place farther from the Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. COLLINS. Pending the establishment of such a plant and the installation of the machinery, you feel that this one ought to be put in tiptop shape?

General BAKER. I do, sir; on the minimum basis necessary to meet the requirements of the first troops to go into the field.

Mr. CASE. I notice that you spoke of the total investment in the Edgewood Arsenal as being $30,000,000.

Colonel ENGLISH. Yes, sir. The initial cost of Edgewood Arsenal was, according to the records, $35,562,781.

Considering the present facilities existing at Edgewood Arsenal at the present location with reference to the chemical industries of the United States and the investment now held by the Government in this property, it would appear that the provision of $5,401,349 to round out this arsenal—of which $854,990 requested for the fiscal year 1941 is only a small part—and put it on an operating basis is reasonable and in sound judgment. If these facilities are provided, it is the most economical means of caring for the initial equipment necessary and the maintenance of the initial protective force of the Army in the field.

Speaking specifically as to the item of $854,990, this project covers rehabilitation of four essential manufacturing plants in the plants area at Edgewood Arsenal, Md., and provides for the necessary additional equipment in order to round them out and put them on a proper operating basis. The necessity for this project is urgent and it covers only a small part of the minimum plant requirements for that station. The total plant requirements as outlined for Edgewood Arsenal in order to place that arsenal on a proper minimum operating basis so that the Chemical Warfare Service may be able to perform its mission in accordance with the National Defense Act requires an expenditure of $5,401,349. The greater part of this expenditure is for new construction, which has not as yet been authorized by Congress. Only so much of these necessary funds for plants, totaling $854,990, is requested, as that does not require authorization, but represents rehabilitation costs of existing installations and the cost of the necessary equipment. The Government has a heavy investment in the plant at Edgewood Arsenal, Md., the figures thereon including the fiscal year 1939 being as follows:

Original cost, 1917–18	$35,562,781
Additional construction costs since 1918	1,671,755
Maintenance, Chemical Warfare Service plants, since 1918	5,875,409
Quartermaster maintenance, estimated	500,000
Total cost to Government	43,609,945

Following the large-scale manufacturing activities that obtained at Edgewood Arsenal up to the close of the World War, the plant has steadily deteriorated throughout the years, due to budgetary limitations and more pressing needs elsewhere of limited funds available to the War Department. The plant that now exists at Edgewood Arsenal comprises some 344 buildings and structures, which provide limited facilities for Chemical Warfare Service activities involving manufacture, research, service-school facilities, ranges for the testing and proving of artillery and chemical munitions; barracks for the Second Separate Chemical Battalion and the Four Hundred and Twelfth Chemical Depot Company; also quarters for 45 officers—16 permanent sets of officers' quarters; balance temporary quarters in converted wartime buildings. The present estimated depreciated value of Government facilities located at Edgewood Arsenal is $14,500,867. These facilities afford employment for 1,409 civilian employees, with a monthly pay roll of $172,504. In addition to this, there is a military pay roll totaling $37,839 per month.

Strategic location of Edgewood Arsenal: There has been advanced by various opponents to any further expenditure of funds at Edgewood Arsenal that its location on the eastern seaboard is wrong, due to its vulnerability to air attack. This contention would equally apply to the entire eastern seaboard. However, there should be considered the question of whether or not the commander of an attacking force would consider Edgewood Arsenal a more lucrative target for bombing operations as opposed to the industrial centers in the East, as well as the larger cities. This also includes the city of Washington. There has also been stated that this arsenal is in effect "putting all of your eggs in one basket," which, of course, should not be done. The answer to this is that a second arsenal should be provided. To do away with Edgewood Arsenal in its entirety and, as it were, move the "basket" to another location does not remedy the situation in this respect. Further, in this connection, the Army and the Navy as well have numerous installations on the Atlantic seaboard, all equally as vulnerable to air attack as is the location of Edgewood Arsenal. It is obvious that the movement of all of these installations to the interior would be out of the question.

Now, as to the Bush River project: Under the Quartermaster Corps' construction requirements, fiscal year 1941, there has been requested of Congress an appropriation totaling $918,988 for the purpose of providing safe and adequate storage of chemical munitions and supplies at the Edgewood Chemical Warfare Depot. This project was authorized by Public, 646, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved June 4, 1936. The total authorization called for an expenditure amounting to $1,114,171 and was designed to correct an extremely hazardous situation that exists at the Edgewood Chemical Warfare Depot, Edgewood, Md. Some background in history in connection with the Edgewood Chemical Warfare Depot and the situation that exists there is necessary in order that an understanding may be had of what is needed.

The Edgewood Chemical Warfare Depot grew up as a result of conditions that existed at Edgewood Arsenal at the termination of the World War. At that time—1918–20—considerable production was current, and outgoing shipments to a great extent stopped. Therefore, it was necessary to store existing munitions then on hand as well as others that had been returned to Edgewood Arsenal. There being no proper magazine storage existing, all items were stored in buildings then available, the authorities being forced into storing these items without regard to approved safety standards. The greater part of these activities were within the confines of Edgewood Arsenal. The final result was that there grew up within the confines of a large manufacturing arsenal a branch depot. These conditions have not materially changed through the years. The conditions now existent may be summarized as follows: Storage of loaded ammunition in ordinary warehouses rather than in approved types of magazines; storage of different types of ammunition, such as powder, explosives, and inflammables in the same building; distances between warehouses considerably less than required by approved safety regulations; storage warehouses contiguous to offices and laboratories where personnel are endangered; storage warehouses within a few hundred yards of quarters occupied by officers and their families.

The construction necessary in order to correct this situation, funds for which are specifically requested in the Quartermaster construction estimates, fiscal year 1941, will provide the most up-to-date, safe storage magazines for chemical ammunition and its components pertaining to both the Ordnance Department and the Chemical Warfare Service. It will also provide proper warehouse facilities for the storage of war reserve items of the Chemical Warfare Service supplies and equipment, together with the necessary utilities and roads. Funds requested for the fiscal year 1941 will provide for a total of 31 buildings, of which 30 will be magazines. The situation regarding this storage is acute, and by all means funds totaling $918,988 should be provided in the fiscal year 1941 to correct it.

As these items of $918,988, known as the Bush River project, and $854,990, Chemical Warfare Service, have been allowed in full in the bill now before us, I again congratulate the Appropriations Committee, and especially my colleagues on the subcommitee, for the change in attitude they have taken toward the development of Edgewood Arsenal and of their apparent willingness to meet the demands of that important branch of our War Department activities as have been consistently recommended to the Congress by the War Department, the Director of the Budget, and the President of the United States.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. SCHULTE: On page 69, after line 8, insert:

"No part of any appropriation made in this act shall be used directly or indirectly after May 1, 1941, for the payment of any civilian for services rendered by them on the Canal Zone while occupying a skilled, technical, clerical, administrative, or supervisory position unless such person is a citizen of the United States: Provided, however, That any employee now in the service who has rendered 10 or more years' faithful and efficient service shall be exempt from the provisions of this section."

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I am proposing would, in effect, prohibit the employment on Army work in the Canal Zone of any alien other than the common laborer after May 1, 1941. This date is set because it will permit ample time for adjustment and will also take care of any budgetary requirements so that no additional funds will be required.

The proviso in my amendment eliminating employees who have 10 or more years faithful and efficient service from the terms of the bill is inserted because the Army is not permitted to retire these aliens as Army employees do not come under the terms of the law which permits Panama Canal or Panama Railroad employees to be so retired, nor does the Army have a fund to repatriate these aliens as does the Panama Canal and Panama Railroad.

It is my understanding that less than 125 aliens will be affected by my amendment in the regular forces maintained on the Zone, but it will also prevent the employment of aliens by contractors doing work for the Army and will cause them to employ American citizens. Contractors in the past have employed aliens to do all building-trades work for a pittance. The average rate of pay of the alien is but $55 per month and their efficiency is but one-third of that of the American workman, according to official reports of United States Government investigators.

On February 16, 1940, this House adopted a much more drastic amendment, reading as follows, which I offered to the Navy appropriation bill. There was but one dissenting vote:

SEC. 7. No part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used, directly or indirectly, after January 1, 1941, for the payment of any civilian for services rendered by them on the Canal Zone while occupying a skilled, technical, clerical, administrative, or supervisory position, unless such person is a citizen of the United States of America.

After the Navy bill reached another body the Navy Department officials analyzed my amendment and after many conferences with all interested parties agreed to the amendment I am submitting to this bill today, which you have heard read by the clerk.

There are no treaties in existence with any nation with which my amendment would interfere in any way as the treaty in existence between our Government and the Republic of Panama applies only to the Panama Canal and the Panama Railroad. But there are employed, by the Army on the Canal Zone, many aliens in skilled positions which should be occupied by American citizens. Let us remember that for every alien displaced, an American citizen will secure employment and that our relief rolls in the United States will be relieved to that extent. Let us remember that for every alien displaced on the Canal Zone, the Government makes a saving because the salary paid to the alien on the Canal Zone added to approximately $1,200 now annually paid a W. P. A. worker, who would replace the alien, will more than amount to the salary paid an American citizen.

There is no agreement to furnish housing for the employees on the Canal Zone so there will be no additional cost because of housing.

Let us adopt my amendment and keep Army procedure on a par with that we required of the Navy in the bill recently passed.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the amendment is substantially the same as the amendment placed on the War Department civil functions appropriation bill, which is now being considered by the Senate Committee on Appropriations. That amendment no doubt will be modified in a way that will accomplish the end sought in a proper and orderly way and without violation of treaty obligations. This amendment no doubt will be similarly modified. For that reason I am willing to accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. Such portions of the appropriations contained herein under the head of "Military activities" on account of classified personal services provided for in the Second Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1939, in the Supplemental Military Appropriation Act, 1940, and in the Emergency Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1940, shall be available for the employment of such personal services only upon a temporary basis.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, this bill was prepared by the War Department subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations. I had the privilege of serving on this subcommittee for the first time. I was very much interested and enjoyed the work with the kindly chairman, the very able clerk, and the members of the committee. Everyone is sincere, well-informed, and an ardent American.

This year, the subject of national defense is of wide interest. This bill, possibly, at this time is of more general public interest than any of the other regular appropriation bills. The hearings are an encyclopedia of information, and I am sure that Members will find it worth while to put a copy in their kit for reading and reference next summer. Also take a copy of the committee report. The report gives the totals to show a reduction of $67,357,660 in cash and of $43,780,500 in contractual authority below the Budget figures, yet the bill carries $785,999,094.

The delayed deliveries on airplanes, the evidence on the need for air bases in Alaska, the extended field maneuvers, the controversy, if it be such, over the new Garand rifle, the place of cavalry in modern warfare—all these subjects are discussed in detail in the hearings. The questions that are being asked in the newspapers were asked in the hearings and the answers are those of the experts who were before the committee. You will keep in mind, of course, that those before us were witnesses who were seeking to justify items requested while we had to keep in mind the state of the Treasury.

I did not take time during general debate to discuss the bill because there were so many requests for time and I was pleased to hear the remarks of others. I was impressed, Mr. Chairman, by the speakers who discussed the meaning of this bill for peace. In the country, today, there is a real desire for us to keep out of war, but the headlines in today's paper show that deliberate efforts will be made to get us into the conflict. In some quarters, there is a feeling of fatalism, of discouragement, a feeling of futility of efforts to keep out of the war.

The committee, necessarily, faced a double responsibility. None of the members want war. We would do nothing to move in that direction. At the same time, when a fire is raging, prudent men check their fire insurance and their fire extinguishers. I am sure that within the funds it seemed wise to spend, and the requests made the committee endeavored to make the best allocations it could. The bill that has now been read is not exactly as any one Member would have written it, but it represents what was achieved by a majority of the Members, with compromises here and there as most bills have. Certainly, as a whole, I think it represents a real insurance policy for this country against war and for safety if war comes.

Mr. Chairman, however, let no Member of this body relax in his efforts to keep America at peace and to bring peace to the world. Although we despair today—

> Wherever men forge upward through the night
> The darkness of the world must yield to light.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill, as amended, do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and Mr. RAYBURN, Speaker pro tempore, having resumed the chair, Mr. WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 9209, the Military Establishment appropriation bill for 1941, directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill, as amended, do pass.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. O'NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the so-called Robsion amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en grosse.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment upon which a separate vote is demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

> On page 30, line 3, strike out all of line 3, and in line 4, strike out "$1,000,000", and correct the total in line 5.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken and the Chair announced the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. O'NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present, and I object to the vote on the ground that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Obviously a quorum is not present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 181, nays 140, not voting 109, as follows:

THE GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE BASIN PROJECT AS IT AFFECTS THE NEUTRALITY OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARTER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, much has been said and written concerning the St. Lawrence seaway and power project, which the President, in his reported version, dusted off a few months ago. The economics of this project have been argued at length pro and con, but all too little consideration has been given to the international aspects of such a joint venture as affecting our neutrality. February 20 last, I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 48, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, where it has rested since. This resolution, if adopted, would put Congress definitely on record as opposed to this St. Lawrence international problem child. I believe we are united and sincere in our efforts to see that this country remains neutral in the present World War venture. Many times we are prompted to wonder whether the administration is doing that which will best maintain our neutrality. Surely, many utterances and activities of the Chief Executive in the past does not seem to be entirely compatible with the maintenance of our complete neutrality.

Let us not make the joint deal with our friendly neighbor to the north, and give our neutrality another slap in the face. It would seem superfluous for me to point out that making an agreement or treaty with Canada, a belligerent, to be partners in jointly constructing and maintaining this seaway and power project would be an unneutral act. I believe it would violate the letter of our Neutrality Act. Certainly it would violate the spirit of that act, and existing precedents in large number under international law, it seems to me, definitely hold that such procedure on our part would make us unneutral in the eyes of international law.

I am not unmindful of the fact that our estimable Secretary of State has blithely said that the conclusion of a treaty with Canada for the development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin project would not affect in any way the complete neutrality of the United States. His letter addressed to our splendid colleague from New York may be found in the Appendix of the RECORD, at page 1251.

I could not believe that this statement represented the completely considered opinion of the State Department. Accordingly I addressed a letter of inquiry to our Secretary of State, March 18, 1940, asking whether the Department felt our neutrality would not be affected by the project and whether joint maintenance of such a project might not increase possibility of sabotage involving our property in the venture.

Mr. Hull's reply to me of March 25, last, said:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 25, 1940.

The Honorable J. FRANCIS HARTER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HARTER: I have received your letter of March 18, 1940, in regard to the possible effect on the neutrality of the United States if the proposed development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin should be carried out.

In reply I desire to assure you that from the point of view of the executive branch of the Government, the proposed project would not affect the neutrality of the United States for the following reasons:

1. The project is not a war measure—it has been under consideration for over 40 years.

2. The project is expected to require several years for its completion, and, while it is impossible to foretell how long the present war will last, it is at least questionable whether the project will be finished in time to be of material aid to Canada in connection with the prosecution of the war.

3. A large part of the St. Lawrence River system lies within the boundaries of the United States, and the development of this section is therefore a domestic matter. It is true that for its complete development the cooperation of Canada is necessary; but, as far as the United States is concerned, the international phases are incidental. The real situation is that this Government desires to make available to the citizens of this country the benefits to be derived from the development of one of its natural resources.

With reference to your question regarding the possibility of sabotage, it appears to me that this is a matter which must be considered in time of peace as well as in war. Having in mind the fact that the whole purpose of the project is to serve peacetime needs and enterprises, and also having in mind that the completely neutral status of the United States in cooperating in the construction of the waterway would not be affected by possible sabotage, it is not perceived why such possibility should be anticipated or regarded as a deterrent.

I share your desire to avoid any step which might complicate the international relations of the United States. However, as I stated in my letter of March 6, 1940, to which you refer, it is the opinion of those whose primary duty it is to safeguard the neutrality of the United States that the conclusion of a treaty with Canada for the development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin would not affect the complete neutrality of this country.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

Since his original letter dismissing the question of violation of our neutrality was placed in the RECORD I deemed it best that Secretary Hull's recent reiteration should also be made available to you for your considered study without comment on my part.

Now what do some other individuals and bodies, who want this country to stay out of war think about the St. Lawrence problem child's effect upon our neutrality, have to say on the subject? The National Rivers and Harbors Congress, with representatives in attendance from all sections of the land, a few days ago by resolution revoked a resolution adopted at a previous congress in favor of the St. Lawrence project, reciting Canada's present involvement and urging complete study of the project. The resolution can be found in the Appendix of the RECORD, page 1859. They do not want to violate our neutrality and recognize that Canada at war might not make such a good partner in this venture. What happened in the New York State Legislature a few days ago? Democratic Assemblyman Canney introduced a resolution opposing the project. The Buffalo Courier Express of April 2, 1940, in an editorial tells you about the legislature's action. It shows that the members of the New York State Legislature voting, voted overwhelmingly against this St. Lawrence project.

On February 19, 1940, in a short address given by Mr. Christy Q. Buscaglia at a large meeting of railroad workers in Buffalo he spoke on this subject. Mr. Buscaglia has long been active in transportation work on the Niagara frontier, especially with the railroad workers. He points out the danger to our neutral position the St. Lawrence project threatens. He is afraid the treaty and project might draw us into war and so are the workers who heard him on that night as they adopted a resolution opposing it.

The Real Estate Owners Taxpayers League, Inc., in Buffalo tell us they are home-owning members with no corporation affiliations and back the resolution of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress I have referred to. They have in mind Uncle Sam's neutrality and want to do nothing to get us nearer to war.

Now why have I taken time to cover these few of many similar remonstrances? I have in mind what the Secretary of State has said as to lack of effect on our neutral position. I recognize that now Canada is a belligerent. Some day, and Heaven forbid Uncle Sam might be at war with a country, with Canada attempting to maintain a neutral position with us and our then enemy. In other words, in this international venture we must recognize a present state of war. Likewise, future conflicting situations must be recognized before either country jumps into this questionable international partnership. I have taken this time today because different Washington newspapers today carried an item with purported quotations from a speech of the Ontario attorney general, given in Cannington, Ontario, Wednesday of this week. He wants Canada to do everything within her power to enlist the active support of the United States in the cause of the Allies. The article leaves no doubt of what he means when he says "active support." He wants the United States in the war. As one of the baits he is quoted as saying, "If the United States wants to build the St. Lawrence waterway, by all means let us join them." So that you will have the whole article, I refer you to the Appendix of the RECORD, page 1871.

Now, Mr. Hull, does that give us any further foundation for our statements that the St. Lawrence pact is dangerous to our neutrality? I, for one, will not trade our peace for any material thing, and certainly not for so questionable an enterprise as the St. Lawrence seaway project—this time being pushed by our present Chief Executive while our proposed partner is at war. Let us leave it alone. Let us turn our head from the foreign conflict to solving our huge domestic problems. In solving them we will place ourselves in a better position to help carry through a more lasting world peace. I am hopeful that the chairman and membership of our Foreign Affairs Committee will carefully ponder this situation and grant a public hearing on House Concurrent Resolution 48.

MEMORIAL TO ROBERT FECHNER

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a copy of a resolution I have today introduced to provide for the erection of a memorial to Robert Fechner and the Civilian Conservation Corps, in the Robert Fechner Memorial Park in Chatham County, Ga., and also to include copies of resolutions adopted by citizens of the city of Savannah and of the county of Chatham.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Tomorrow, Friday, April 5, marks the close of the seventh year of the successful operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps of the United States of America, during which period the activities and the accomplishments in the administraton of that department were due largely to the leadershp of Robert Fechner, of Savannah, Ga., now deceased, whose talents, powers of leadership and of organization contributed eminently to the success of this great national movement to conserve the young manhood and natural resources of our country.

The city of Savannah, Ga., was the home of the late Robert Fechner, first Director of the Civilian Conservation Corps.

To his memory a tract of 750 acres of land has been set aside and called the Robert Fechner Memorial Park. In it a C. C. C. camp has provided recreational facilities for the benefit of our people.

To many of us, including friends and admirers of the work of C. C. C. from other parts of the country, it has seemed meet and proper to use this locality to erect a permanent memorial not only to the memory of a devoted and eminently capable public servant but moreover to the spirit of the corps.

C. C. C., as conceived by the President, is an example of a social and economic experiment that the world to come will likely look back upon as a social landmark.

Different from Europe, which absorbs its jobless youth in standing armies, C. C. C. in this country is a purely civilian force. It not only takes up the so far unavoidable surplusage of labor at a critical age, but gives young men wholesome discipline, training, and a fresh outlook on life. It brings these boys in intimate touch with Nature and her vast resources. It teaches them the value of conservation to the end that, by means of this natural wealth, human life itself be elevated and enriched.

The great good which has accrued to the Nation by virtue of the C. C. C. is inestimable.

From one end to the other of our country C. C. C. has been engaged in work of conservation until, after 7 years of earnest and devoted labor, the time has come when we should show in one building a comprehensive picture of its labors and surround it with appropriate planting.

A museum of conservation, as portrayed by C. C. C., would open the eyes of many and delight and give comfort to the vast host of friends of conservation.

If such a presentation could be made running the whole gamut of C. C. C. enterprise and achievement, if it is desired to pay grateful tribute to the man who with undying fidelity, never-ending patience, incorruptible conscience, and magnificent administrative talent marshaled the young army of peacetime soldiers, no better way could be found than to emphasize conservation, its guiding thought, and no more fitting place could be found than Robert Fechner Memorial Park, in the city of Savannah, from whence he went forth to serve his country and never gave up until his dying day.

His life was an inspiration to American youth and he was its best friend.

I have today introduced a joint resolution for the erection of a suitable museum of conservation in the Robert Fechner Memorial Park in Chatham County, Ga. A similar resolution will be introduced in the Senate tomorow by Senators WALTER F. GEORGE and RICHARD B. RUSSELL, jointly. It is proper that such resolution be introduced on tomorrow. However, in view of the fact that the House will not be in session tomorrow it becomes necessary that I take such action in the House today.

This resolution should have the wholehearted approval and support of every Member of Congress who believes in the great work that is being done through the Civilian Conservation Corps and which has been so successfully promoted through the untiring efforts of the late Robert Fechner.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
CITY OF SAVANNAH, GA., April 1, 1940.

Hon. HUGH PETERSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN PETERSON: I enclose herewith copy of telegram I sent you last night, at the same time sending the same telegram to Senator GEORGE and Senator RUSSELL.

I also enclose copy of article appearing in the Savannah Morning News of this date and a somewhat detailed report on the Robert Fechner Recreation Center set aside in Bacon Park.

We are hopeful that through the united efforts of our Senators and Representative this Robert Fechner Recreation Center will be converted into a public memorial to the late Director Robert Fechner, of the Civilian Conservation Corps, and that the National Park Service will be authorized by Congress, under a joint resolution, to develop this Robert Fechner memorial in a way worthy of him in whose honor it will be carried on.

Inasmuch as the coming Friday is the seventh anniversary of the founding of the C. C. C. and the late Robert Fechner having been the Director of the C. C. C. from its inauguration until his death recently, we all feel there could be no more auspicious time to present a resolution providing for this memorial than on this seventh anniversary date.

Our people all sincerely hope that our two Senators and our Representative from the First District will unite in the preparation and in the presentation and adoption of the joint resolution referred to.

Nothing would give greater joy to the people of Savannah and Chatham County than to have such a resolution presented on Friday and, if possible, passed by both the Senate and the House. We feel that the work done by the late Director Fechner justifies such a memorial to him.

If there is any further information desired, kindly wire me and it will be immediately supplied, and if you desire any further cooperative work on our part kindly let me know promptly.

With best wishes, sincerely yours,

THOMAS GAMBLE, Mayor.

SAVANNAH, GA., March 31, 1940.

Hon. WALTER F. GEORGE,
United States Senator,
United States Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

Hon. RICHARD B. RUSSELL,
United States Senator,
United States Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

Hon. HUGH PETERSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Friday, April 5, will be the seventh anniversary of the founding of the Civilian Conservation Corps, an agency of the Federal Government, that during this period has firmly established itself in the confidence of the American people, won for itself their continued and increasing support, and justified the splendid testimonial of the faith of the Senate and the House of Representatives in its plans, its practical work, and its splendid achievements throughout the country in the shape of adequate appropriations to carry on its services. The anniversary celebration directs attention anew to the magnificent leadership of the Civilian Conservation Corps by its late director, the lamented Robert Fechner, whose splendid organization activities and remarkable administration abilities developed and maintained it as a work project that brought the praise of the American people, regardless of section or of political affiliations. The seventh anniversary of the establishment of the Civilian Conservation Corps leads us to urge that Georgia's two Senators and our Representative of the First Georgia Congressional District unite in presenting on next Friday a joint resolution calling for the creation of a national memorial to Director Robert Fechner at Savannah, Ga., in the adoption by the National Park Service of the Robert Fechner Center already established by the city of Savannah with a large existing park area and the development by the National Park Service of such a memorial in a manner worthy to perpetuate the labors for the public welfare of the American Congress and Director Fechner. Your united cordial and zealous cooperation to this end is urged as assured of the approval of the American people.

THE CITY OF SAVANNAH,
By THOMAS GAMBLE, Mayor.

Joint resolution to provide for the erection of a memorial to Robert Fechner and the Civilian Conservation Corps in the Robert Fechner Memorial Park, in Chatham County, Ga.

Such museum shall be maintained and cared for by the Civilian Conservation Corps and shall contain such exhibits as the Director shall deem appropriate to show the functions and accomplishments of the Civilian Conservation Corps since its establishment.

SEC. 2. The design of such memorial shall be subject to the approval of the Commission of Fine Arts.

In the city of Savannah the late Robert Fechner, the first Director of the Civilian Conservation Corps, passed many years of his life. He was intimately identified with the interests of the city, and the people of the city of Savannah have already established a memorial park in his honor. The purpose of the joint resolution is to maintain a center or a museum in that park by the Civilian Conservation Corps under the direction of the Director of the Civilian Conservation Corps. Washington, April 4, 1940.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: My attention has been called to an article appearing on the front page of the Washington Times Herald this morning, copy enclosed, the headlines of which state "Arnold blasts Allies plane sale by United States."

In order to correct any erroneous impression or opinion gained from this article, I wish to inform you that I am in full accord with the release policy for the foreign sale of aircraft as presented to your committee by the Secretary of War, Mr. Woodring, in his recent appearance.

Prior to my concurrence in this policy my technical and tactical staff and myself made a very careful study of the effects on the Air Corps expansion program. I am confident that the new policy will operate to the advantage of the Army Air Corps and thereby the national defense.

Sincerely,

H. H. ARNOLD,
Major General, Air Corps.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States, submitting a nomination, was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the Senate took a recess yesterday the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] had an amendment pending, and occupied the floor. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words on the pending amendment, and then I wish to discuss to some extent the joint resolution in general.

Mr. President, if this amendment shall be adopted, it will stop the attack on farmers' income that has been conducted under treaty agreements. For that purpose I offer it.

The amendment now pending covers schedule 7 of the Tariff Act of 1930, and is confined to the items enumerated in schedule 7—exclusively agricultural products. I have framed the amendment in that way on the theory that so long as we have a system of tariffs, and so long as tariffs cannot be effective on agricultural surpluses, which we must sell on the world market, a tariff can be beneficial only on the crops and commodities of the farm of which we have no surplus and which are sold in the American market—of which market the American farmer is entitled to receive the benefit.

I voted for the Trade Agreements Act in 1934. I did so for several reasons. One reason was that there was an emergency. Another reason was that our foreign trade was in a very bad condition. The main reason was that we were assured by those who sponsored the trade pacts that they were good Yankee traders; they would trade agricultural surpluses out of the country; they would use the pacts to get rid of agricultural surpluses; and they were to be used particularly for the benefit of agriculture. Industry had its tariffs, which were effective, under the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act. It was my opinion, after visiting Europe a year after the passage of that act, that the act had actually hurt the farmers of the United States. So when we were assured that the instrument of reciprocity agreements would be used to trade agricultural products out of the country, I thought, "Very well; I am for reciprocity for the benefit of the United States, and particularly for the benefit of agriculture"; but if we are going to make a trade at the expense of anyone, it should be at the expense of the most prosperous and not at the expense of the most needy. I am of the opinion that if anyone has received a benefit from these treaties he has received it at the expense of agriculture.

While we were told that the trade agreements were to be used to trade agricultural products out of the country, we now find that tariffs have been reduced on about 150 agricultural products, and agricultural products are not traded out of the country by reducing the tariffs on similar articles of foreign production so that they can come into this country.

Among the products on which tariffs have been reduced are cattle, pork, milk, cheese, poultry, eggs, potatoes, barley, oats, rye, strawberries, cabbage, and other vegetables. Those articles cannot be traded out of the country by reducing the tariffs on them.

It has been said that the trade treaties have been of great benefit to the automobile industry. The automobile industry is the most prosperous industry we have in this country. We did not need to make a trade agreement for its benefit, at the expense of the farmer. That was not necessary. I do not blame the representatives of the automobile industry for coming before the Finance Committee of the Senate and praising the beneficial effect of these trade pacts. Of course, it has been the rule in any kind of a tariff measure that industry shall have the benefit, usually at the expense of the farmer, because the farmer is a producer of surpluses which must be sold on the world market, which is a cheap market, while he buys in a dear market, because it is a protected market. Even with the administration of the act in the hands of those who said they would trade agricultural products out of the country for the benefit of the farmer, what do we find in the case of the treaty with Canada? The automobile industry was very much pleased with that treaty; but while the trade agreement with Canada, in and of itself, was not so terrifically important, the most-favored-nation clause was invoked under it, which was certainly unexpected at the time we voted for these trade treaties; and so we find imports of articles referred to in the agreement with Canada coming into the United States from other countries than Canada.

It may have been the intention, at the time we passed the act in 1934, to invoke the most-favored-nation clause; but, so far as I remember, nothing was said about that.

It is said the tariff is a local problem, and it is true, to some extent it is a local problem. The State of Minnesota is the greatest producer of butter, and the neighboring State of Wisconsin is a producer of cheese. What was the effect of these treaties upon the cheese industry? The tariff on cheese was reduced about 42 percent, resulting in the cutting of the price of cheese in the United States from about 17 cents to less than 13 cents a pound. There were imported last year about 59,000,000 or 60,000,000 pounds of cheese.

What happened within a year after the Canadian trade treaty was entered into? It opened up the market for cheese imports from the countries of Europe, and it drove the price of cheese so low that it resulted in the closing of around 300 cheese factories in the State of Wisconsin alone.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I am very much interested in the comment of the distinguished Senator in relation to cheese. I wish to call to his attention a significant matter, showing how the treaty has operated in my own State in relation to cheese.

In 1938, when cheese was bringing 12.6 cents a pound the whole year, the second Canadian trade treaty reduced the tariff another cent a pound, or about 20 percent. As is known, cheese at 12.6 cents a pound represents less than two-thirds of the cost of production. Why the additional reduction in the tariff was made I do not know.

I have in my hand a letter from Representative REID F. MURRAY, who states that for a year he has been seeking to find why the reduction was made. He said the trade treaties were supposed to have been made on the advice of experts, and that he would like to ascertain who the experts were who recommended this reduction. I should like to know whether the distinguished Senator knows who the experts were, or why, under the conditions, when cheese was being sold at less than the cost of production, the tariff was reduced.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I think I can inform the Senator; but I wish to proceed with the statement I was making in regard to the price of cheese and butter.

Driving these cheese factories out of business turned the farmers who had been making cheese out of their milk to the making of butter, throwing extra butter upon the market. In 1938 butter was selling for about 22 cents a pound throughout the whole summer, and then, through the Commodities Credit Corporation, we subsidized butter and pegged it to 25½ cents.

About 60,000,000 pounds of cheese were imported last year. If that cheese had been made in the United States out of milk which otherwise would have gone to make butter, it would have lifted from 20,000,000 to 30,000,000 pounds off the butter market of the United States. I saw by reports yesterday that the price of cheese was 20 cents a pound in Chicago and that the price of butter was 28½ cents.

The dairy people figure that the price for a pound of butter should be about two and a half times the price of a pound of cheese, and if that is correct, at this time butter, in relation to cheese, should be selling for approximately 50 cents a pound; and, so far as parity in our agricultural program is concerned, the price should be between 40 and 50 cents a pound.

Before this matter came before Congress at the last session a public notice was issued that "treaties are to be negotiated with the following countries: Argentina, Belgium, Chile, Cuba, and Venezuela." The official announcements give us an idea of the international-pact program forthcoming in the event Congress votes for the 3-year extension.

It will be noted that four of the countries now on the list for new trade pacts are agricultural, as are Canada, Brazil, the Netherlands, and its colonies in the East Indies, likewise the colonial possessions of France and the United Kingdom. When it comes to Brazil and the Dutch East Indies and the Orient, I do not think it is fair to say that all agricultural products are competitive. Men know better than that. It cannot be said that rubber and coffee and spices and other products of similar character can be put in the same category with competitive agricultural imports. I believe there is some misunderstanding, because noncompetitive agricultural imports have been thrown into the same basket with competitive imports. The imports to which I object are the imports of competitive agricultural products.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Noncompetitive agricultural products carry no tariffs.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Of course not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. No one favors any restriction being placed on them. The reciprocal trade agreements program does not affect noncompetitive agricultural products in any way.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have here from the Department of Agriculture figures as to all exports and imports from 1935 to and including 1939. They are divided into three categories. First, all commodities which are exported, then agricultural products, and third, nonagricultural products.

The statement shows what our trade has been with the 18 countries with which we have trade agreements. I will give the totals, and I will ask to have printed in the RECORD the complete statement, after I have read the totals.

In the time specified we gained, in the case of all commodities, about $625,000,000, representing a gain of about 50½ percent on all commodities exported. As to agricultural exports during that time, we lost about $3,000,000, which is infinitesimal, a percentage of only 0.07. We did not gain; we lost a little. However, as to nonagricultural exports, that is, exports of the products of industry, we gained 79.2 percent. Industrial products got the benefit, of course not entirely due to the trade pacts, but undoubtedly, to a large extent, due to war buying. At any rate, so far as 18 countries with which we had agreements were concerned, we gained in exports of industry and lost a little in the case of agricultural exports.

During the same period of time our exports of all commodities to nonagreement countries, countries with which we had no agreement, increased 25 percent. The gain was only about one-half of what it was with trade-agreement countries.

In regard to agriculture, with agreement countries we lost less than 1 percent of that trade, and with nonagreement countries we lost 29 percent.

Nonagricultural exports gained 48.9 percent. Industry gets the benefit even in the case of trade with nonagreement countries. Possibly war purchases had something to do with that.

With respect to imports for consumption, brought into this country from agreement countries, in all commodities we gained 15.4 percent. Our importation of agricultural commodities gained 2.3 percent, which is very small percentage. Nonagricultural imports increased 28.6 percent. Those figures relate to our trade with the 18 trade-agreement countries.

From the nonagricultural countries, in all commodities we imported there was an increase of 6.4 percent, and an increase of 6.8 percent in agricultural products. Nonagricultural imports from nonagreement countries increased 5.9 percent.

Mr. President, I ask to have the entire statement placed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[2] Belgium, Brazil.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I will say that I have seen reports from the Department of Agriculture that do not agree with the statement I have placed in the RECORD, and I will tell the Senate why. That statement is based upon the figures for the calendar year, while the Department's statement is based upon the figures for the fiscal year. Their statement ends at the end of 1938, and does not include the figures for the year 1939, and the figures for that year alone changed the picture from that presented by the Department of Agriculture. I do not mean to say that it was done intentionally, but it makes an entirely different picture.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] inquired as to why there was the extra tariff reduction of 1 cent, who wanted it, and for whose benefit it was made. I have some notes I shall follow in logical sequence and I think I shall come to a discussion of that matter.

The 7-cents-a-pound tariff of 1935 on cheese was cut first to 5 cents, and finally in 1939, in the revision of the agreement with Canada, to 4 cents a pound. The reduction in the cheese duty from 7 to 5 cents caused cheese imports to jump 1,400 percent. Then in 1939 came the cut to 4 cents, and cheese imports again rose threefold. From an average price of 17 cents in prereciprocal-trade years the price dropped to an average of 13 cents, with a corresponding drop in butter prices, resulting in a reduction of around $200,000,000 in cash income to the dairy farmers engaged in cooperative dairying.

If the proposed pact with Argentina is signed there will be admitted to the American market the products of a country in which butter is produced at 12 cents a pound and cheese at 8 cents a pound, which soon would force American dairy cooperatives to give up the idea of cooperative independence, and accept Federal subsidies, following the example of the crop growers who received $800,000,000 last year. As a matter of fact, we are subsidizing the dairy farmer now, because of the low prices. We might say that we are indirectly subsidizing dairy-product imports.

In answer to the question of the Senator from Wisconsin as to who were in favor of these reductions, and who were heard, I find that the processors, the large processors of dairy products have been very prosperous. They undoubtedly have favored the reduction, because whether cheese is worth 15 cents a pound or 20 cents a pound makes very little difference to the processor who buys the raw product from the farmer. The cheaper he can buy the raw product the more volume he will have and the greater profits he will receive. I can see that those who speak for the processors would be in favor of having large imports, particularly if they have plants in foreign countries, as so many of our processors have. The cooperative farm organizations in this country certainly have not asked for the lowering of the tariff.

Let us see who may possibly have been interested in lowering the tariffs on these agricultural products. Included in that category are the dairy corporations, organized with Delaware charters, whose stock is quoted on the stock exchanges and bucketshops, and who have been engaged for years in the fight against the farm cooperatives.

I will take one of them as an example. An international dairy-products organization has been very prosperous even with these low prices; in fact it started to make money and increased its profits as the price of dairy products went down. This corporation owns 54 subsidiary corporations having Delaware charters, 14 having New York charters, and 34 subsidiary corporations in Canada, 2 in Holland, 4 in the United Kingdom, 3 in Australia, and other subsidiaries in Belgium and Argentina.

The organization referred to is engaged in wholesale and retail distribution and exporting and importing agricultural products. In spite of the fact that the dairy farmers have had tremendous losses, I have no doubt that this corporation, which I take as an example, this international dairy products organization which is engaged in processing and handling dairy products, had the ear of the experts who wrote this treaty.

It is natural to assume that an international corporation dealing with commodities which are being considered by the experts in making a trade agreement would be very much interested if the corporation owns subsidiaries in Canada, Belgium, Holland, Argentina, and Australia; at least it would be natural to be the first to be consulted, especially when that corporation is not only a manufacturer but a wholesaler, and retailer and distributor and an importer.

If that corporation duplicated its organization in the United States by owning two subsidiaries in Montreal, and a "National Dairy Products Corporation of Canada," with general offices at Toronto, in control of its Canadian companies, it naturally would be deeply interested in the reciprocal-trade pact with Canada. Such pact became effective January 1, 1936, and immediately the sales volume, the net profits, the dividend balance of National Dairy Products Corporation, as reported by Poor and Moody began to mount, though the farm cooperatives began to lose.

Owning a 100-percent voting interest in the dairy subsidiaries of Belgium and Holland, that corporation would be profoundly interested in the reciprocal-trade pacts with Belgium and Holland and any other country which would make a trade agreement with us, under which, through the most-favored-nation clause, every other nation would be given benefits in connection with dairy products.

Owning 60-percent stock interest in Australian dairy subsidiaries, the corporation naturally would be interested in the pact with Great Britain, which included all colonial possessions of the United Kingdom.

On January 1, 1939, the trade agreement with the United Kingdom became effective. At the same time the Canadian pact was revised, so that the duty on Cheddar cheese, which had been cut from 7 cents a pound in 1935 to 5 cents a pound in 1936, was cut to 4 cents, and immediately the profits or dividends of the National Dairy Products Corporation, as reported by Poor and Moody, mounted to the highest level in years.

In the corporation's report to stockholders, filed with Poor and Moody, their total business in terms of milk rose from 8,275,000,000 gallons in 1934 to 9,698,000,000 in 1938. The company had the largest profit in its history. The return on the capital investment jumped from 5.83 percent to 9.47 percent. Gross profits rose from $13,000,000 in 1935 to $17,000,000 in 1936, a 1-year gain of $3,600,000, and the advance notice given out by the president of the corporation promises record profits for 1939.

From the very start of the trade-agreements policy the balance for dividends began to rise, as shown by the reports to stockholders. In 1934 dividends of $66.38 a share were paid on the preferred stock; in 1935, $94.60 a share; and in 1936, $134.56 a share. For the first 6 months of 1939 operating profits were more than $9,000,000; and the report adds:

> With unit sales volume running at the highest level in the corporation's history.

The country may well congratulate the board of directors of the National Dairy Products Corporation and its 75,000 stockholders on the recent growth of their national and international enterprise; but at the same time every American citizen cannot help regretting that the prosperity which has visited the world's greatest dairy-processing corporation is not also enjoyed by the farm cooperatives, which are the greatest agricultural asset of a score of the principal States of the Midwest which produce the raw materials for the processors, who, controlling the market and having the privilege of importing their material into this country and selling it on the American market, which ought to belong to the American farmer, pay dividends as high as $135 a share. The charge of monopolistic practices against this concern has been dismissed by the Department of Justice.

The National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation, meeting in Chicago in November 1939, condemned the trade-agreement program in the following words:

> We believe that the present trade-agreement program of the Federal Government, as administered by the Secretary of State, is detrimental to the welfare of agriculture and particularly to the producers of dairy, livestock, and poultry products.

Mr. President, I have briefly tried to give an idea of what the result has been to the dairy farmers. Of course, the result is not all due to the trade agreements. We find that in the northern dairy States, where the cost of production is greater than in the South, the increase in dairy cattle has been only 5 percent; while in the South, where hay crops are now grown instead of cotton and tobacco, since we started the A. A. A. farm program, dairy cattle have increased in number 21 percent. The increase in dairying in the South and the importations of cheese have affected the cheese market, which in turn has affected the butter market, and as a result we have the conditions which I have described in the agricultural sections where the main industry is dairying. Hogs sold yesterday in Kansas City for $3.75 per hundredweight.

I feel that I should not be true to the constituency which has honored me if I did not rise upon the floor of the Senate and present their case. However, it is not only the condition of the dairy industry and the effect of the trade treaties upon that industry which make me take a different position than I took in 1934. In 1937, when the law was extended, I was too ill to be present. At that time we had not had much time to observe what the results had been. As I stated in the beginning, I voted for this arrangement in 1934 because we were told that the men in charge of the administration were good Yankee traders who would use their power to trade agricultural surpluses out of the country. They may be Yankee traders, but certainly they traded some Yankee farmers to the detriment of their pocketbooks.

Mr. President, we are confronted with a condition which we did not confront in 1934. Then the world was at peace. Now we have a condition in which the world is at war. In my colloquy with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] the other day we agreed that the first casualty in war is the truth, and that the second is international exchange in currencies. We do not know where currencies are going, except that we know they are going down. We do not know how far down they are going, because we do not know how long the world war will last. We know how far down they went in some countries as a result of the last World War. We shall have to decide whether to permit our currency to follow those of other countries in order to defend our trade or whether we wish to protect our own American market and our own currency. On account of the depreciation of currencies tariffs may be reduced as much as 99 percent or wiped out for all practical purposes.

It seems to me it is a dangerous thing now to tie our international trade in a strait jacket. We cannot anticipate all the things which may happen to our trade under such conditions. I think it is much more dangerous now than it was in 1934 to fix tariffs by agreement for a period of 3 years until we know what is going to happen to currencies and to trade.

After all, the medium of exchange—so far as there will be a medium of exchange aside from pure barter—will be in terms of currency. Settlement will be made in terms of currency; and that fact may eradicate all protective barriers against many things which may happen in Europe.

I wish to read an editorial, not as an excuse but as a reason why we had good reason to expect that the market for agricultural products would be protected in these pacts. I have before me an cditorial from the Minneapolis Tribune of April 1, 1940. I read a part of the editorial:

Speaking at Baltimore on October 25, 1932, Mr. Roosevelt said: "It is absurd to talk of lowering tariff duties on farm products. I declared that all prosperity in the broader sense springs from the soil. I promised to endeavor to restore the purchasing power of the farm dollar by making the tariff effective for agriculture, and raising the price of farmers' products. I know of no effective excessively high tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered. To do so would be inconsistent with my entire farm program, and every farmer knows it and will not be deceived."

In the light of the 6-year record under Mr. Roosevelt's trade-pact law, can we blame the farmer for feeling that he has been deceived? Can we blame him for having misgivings about the future use of this unrestricted power?

In spite of that promise, tariffs have been reduced on more than 150 farm products.

Mr. President, I send the editorial to the desk and ask that it be printed in full in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Minneapolis (Minn.) Tribune of April 1, 1940]

THE FARM ANGLE

Senators from these Northwestern States stood solidly for the Pittman amendment Friday and thereby carried out the expressed wishes of the great farm organizations. Renewal of the trade-pact law without the restrictions favored by farm leaders will be regarded with misgivings in the light of what has been done already. Duties on 160 farm products and commodities that are produced in this country have been reduced by means of trade agreements negotiated under this law in the last 6 years.

The people of the farm States are not in dissent from the purpose of stimulating foreign trade, but they fail to see wisdom in bargains that increase our surplus of farm products by letting down the bars for competitive imports.

It is of record that in 1939 there were imported into the United States 754,000 head of cattle, 86,000,000 pounds of potatoes, 59,000,000 pounds of cheese, and many other products competing with the output of our own farms. Meanwhile our export market has been drying up.

Congress has voted again to yield its tariff-making powers to the President and the Secretary of State. Unless it imposes some sort of restrictive rule, we may expect more trading off of the farmer in reciprocity deals to be made later. The Argentine negotiations have been suspended, but no doubt will be resumed after election. The only concessions that Argentina wants are on its farm products.

The effect of the most-favored-nation agreements is especially vicious, taken in connection with the trade pacts. These standing agreements extend to nearly every country within scope of our trade the concessions made in deals with individual nations. For instance, when the pact with Canada cut 4 cents a pound from the duty on dressed poultry and 5 cents a dozen from the duty on eggs, these tariff concessions were automatically extended to all the other countries.

Among the farm products on which tariff duties have been cut by the Roosevelt trade pacts are cattle, pork, milk, cheese, poultry, eggs, potatoes, barley, oats, rye, strawberries, cabbage, and other vegetables.

Speaking at Baltimore on October 25, 1932, Mr. Roosevelt said:

"It is absurd to talk of lowering tariff duties on farm products. I declared that all prosperity in the broader sense springs from the soil. I promised to endeavor to restore the purchasing power of the farm dollar by making the tariff effective for agriculture and raising the price of farmers' products. I know of no effective excessively high tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered. To do so would be inconsistent with my entire farm program, and every farmer knows it and will not be deceived."

In the light of the 6-year record under Mr. Roosevelt's trade-pact law, can we blame the farmer for feeling that he has been deceived? Can we blame him for having misgivings about the future use of this unrestricted power?

Mr. BRIDGES obtained the floor.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment? I desire to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question.

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. May I ask the Senator from Minnesota whether it was his intention, in the amendment which he has presented, to exclude wool as an agricultural product?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No; that was not my intention.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Is the Senator aware that his amendment does not cover wool?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No; I was not aware of that. I think wool ought to be included. My amendment includes schedule 7 in toto. It is not my intention or desire that wool shall not be included.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator's amendment refers to all the paragraphs of schedule 7 of the Tariff Act of 1930. Schedule 7 deals solely with certain agricultural products. Wool and manufactured products of wool are contained in schedule 11.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Raw wool?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes; raw wool. Would the Senator be willing to modify his amendment so as to include wool?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; I will do that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Then, later on, the Senator perhaps can present that amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator will draw the amendment, I will be glad to accept it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Very well.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, the act which we are now considering is one which grants terrific power. It grants that terrific power to just one man, the President. For 6 years this act has given to one man the power of life and death over not only all our industries but over our workers, our farmers, and our States. It has given to one man the power of economic life or death over whole sections of this country, and to control them as he wishes by this power without the right of appeal.

The Bill of Rights was drawn up carefully to preserve our rights. Certainly it is no less necessary under our Constitution to insure our rights, in this instance, from decisions made by the Executive, which may mean the loss of livelihood to those whom they affect.

Life or death power without appeal is "too much power for a bad man to have, and too much for a good man to want." Those are the words of Secretary Cordell Hull, himself, who now is trying to change it with this policy. The Secretary of State was, to my mind, right—it is too much power for any man. And I make no reservations in that statement, whether that man be a Democratic or a Republican President of the United States.

As the situation stands now, the representatives of foreign countries have more to say about these agreements which vitally affect our American standard of living than do the Senators and Representatives duly elected to represent the American people. The American representatives are excluded even from their constitutional duty of ratifying treaties.

On March 5, 1934, Franklin D. Roosevelt, when referring to the trade-agreement program which the administration had placed before Congress at that time, said:

> Legislation such as this is an essential step in the program of national economic recovery which the Congress has elaborated during the past year. It is part of an emergency program necessitated by the economic crisis through which we are passing. I hope for early action. The many immediate situations in the field of international trade that today await our attention can thus be met effectively and with the least possible delay.

Mr. President, I ask, referring to the extension of the reciprocal-trade treaties, when will the present administration stop imposing emergencies on the American people and then presume 3 and 6 years later that emergency acts are permanent acts? In short, is this extension, which we are today considering, an emergency or is it not? If it is not, then should we not cast aside as irrelevant all the arguments and reasons which caused its original passage as emergency legislation?

Mr. President, the American people have for the last 6 years been spoon fed and propagandized with the idea that the New Deal foreign policy, of which the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act is such an important part, was responsible in a large measure for the maintenance of world peace. That is just not so. Major nations of the world have been engaged in war constantly since 1934—since the institution of the Hull trade treaties—and yet to show the Senate the hand-and-glove work of our foreign Ambassadors and our State Department at home, let me quote from an address by Hugh R. Wilson, United States Ambassador to Germany, as late as April 13, 1938. Note that this was before Munich, to be sure. Ambassador Wilson said:

> There is still dangerous economic instability in many parts of the world. We in America are now doing what we can toward remedying this situation and toward undoing the errors of the past. To attain this end we have embarked upon a course of policy designed to promote the return to normal and profitable commercial relations between countries. We chose the method of negotiating reciprocal-trade agreements as the principal instrument of this policy. The choice was deliberate and based upon the profound conviction that no more effective and constructive method could be found. We are working on these agreements with determination and painstaking care. Much progress has been made, and we hope for more.

Mr. President, if it could be said that much progress had been made by embarking the United States—

> Upon a course of policy designed to promote the return to normal and profitable commercial relations between countries—

In April 1938, as has been stated by Ambassador Wilson, what normal and profitable relations have we to look forward to today? It probably would not be fair to say that reciprocal-trade agreements negotiated with European nations were a cause of the war of nerves which held the whole world in the grip of fear throughout the summer of 1938. It might not be fair to say that the negotiations of trade treaties ended in the Munich Pact in November of 1938. Indeed, it might not be fair to say that the trade treaties gave rise to powerful dictatorships which today exist in Europe and the Far East, but which did not exist before 1934. But it is fair, I believe, to say that the American people as a whole do not wish their economy to be meshed with that of Europe and Asia. Secretary Hull himself says:

> We are now in a period when, as a result of the new and widespread wars, the need for means of prompt and effective action on the part of the Government in the promotion and defense of our foreign commerce is even more imperative than it has been hitherto. We are in a period in which our economic policies and action may have a determining influence upon the developments, which, after the cessation of hostilities, will shape the future world.

Mr. President, I think it can truthfully be said, after a review of the world's history for the last 6 years, that these foreign-trade treaties of ours have had little, if anything, to do with shaping or determining whether war or peace shall prevail abroad. The administration having prophesied through its many agents located in the many strategic positions throughout the world that the trade treaties would do much to keep peace, we have been sadly disillusioned. Now, I think that it behooves the Senate at this time to pay little if any attention to the prognostications of Mr. Roosevelt's Department of State so far as the extension of this act is concerned. I think our first loyalty is to the American people—to the farmer, the manufacturer, the home owner, and the industrialist.

Let me indicate briefly what some of these people think of the reciprocal trade agreement policy.

Mr. L. J. Taber, master of the National Grange, told the United States Senate Committee on Finance that he wanted it first understood that the National Grange was continuing its opposition to the renewal of this act for another period of 3 years. He said:

> We are glad to note that every farm organization is now opposed to the passage of this act without some type of corrective amendments.

I do not need to emphasize the fact that the National Grange, with a representative membership from all over the country, has always been nonpartisan.

Hon. William R. Castle, former Under Secretary of State, commented on these agreements for the press a year ago. Let me quote you a bit of his article:

> There are certain ways in which the trade agreements are positively harmful to the country. One, and perhaps the most important, is that they constitute another blow at our balanced system of government, placing unwarranted power in the hands of the Executive.

He goes on to say—

> It is difficult to explain how anyone can praise and support the reciprocal-trade agreements and at the same time claim to be equally in accord with the domestic policy of the administration. The two are incompatible. In fact, the domestic policy seems almost designed to prevent the agreements from being of any value to the United States. Trade is, as the Secretary of State keeps pointing out, a two-way proposition. He is right in insisting that we must import if we want to export, but he does not so clearly realize that we also must sell if we want to buy.

Hon. George N. Peek, former trade adviser to the President, and also an expert on this subject, comments that it is his—

> Considered judgment that the administration has gone dangerously astray in its adoption of a foreign-trade policy which, for the most part, is in conflict with our internal economic problem and policy, particularly as regards agriculture, and which in some respects is diametrically opposed to the attainment of domestic economic balance.

Finally, he says that—

> This policy, therefore, is not in the interest of the United States.

There we have the viewpoint of some of our greatest agricultural and trade experts on this policy in which the administration still persists.

From the angle of industry let me quote you a few comments that are pertinent.

On March 19, 1930, the National Advisory Council of Independent Small Business Men wrote me:

> If treaties are to be negotiated, smaller-business men—and there are over 4,000,000 in the country—feel that our interests are safer in the hands of our Senators than in the hands of any appointees or so-called experts; and trust, if the reciprocity idea is to be continued, that with us you will fight for the right of review and sanction by the Senate of all pacts or treaties that so vitally affect our general welfare.

The members of the Manufacturers' Association of my own State have written me that they as a body are against this policy as it now stands; and I believe, from what they say, that they have seen through the problem. Let me quote just a sentence from their letter:

> The haste and urgency employed to have this law extended indicate clearly that it is a political whim rather than a beneficial expedient which should be allowed to stand or fall on its merit.

Here is another viewpoint. Dan Tobin, American Federation of Labor vice president, and president of the Teamsters'

International Union, also spoke about this program. In an editorial in the February issue of the Teamsters' Journal he says:

> Your Congressman and your Senator should know your views on reciprocal-trade treaties, the continuance of which jeopardizes your job opportunities and your standard of living.

The American Flint Glass Workers' Union wrote the Committee on Reciprocity Information as follows:

> The action of those entrusted with the carrying on or the negotiation of trade treaties in alleging or assuming that they believe, through our entry into a trade treaty with Belgium, a nation interested at the present time in maintaining its very life, they can increase job opportunities for American workers only through securing a reduction in our present tariff duties on imports from Belgium, to our mind well illustrates the hypocrisy which underlies our present trade-treaty policy.

Let me read a little further from the letter of the Flint Glass Workers' Union:

> We sincerely trust that your comimttee, in view of the present unsettled world conditions, realizing that the purposes of the legislation which authorizes our entry into trade treaties with foreign nations cannot now be secured, will have the courage to publicly recommend the indefinite postponement of our negotiation of any trade treaties.

I do not need to quote to you the position of the wage earner—the little fellow—as to this policy which Mr. Hull is so vigorously pursuing. All I need to do is to remind you of the millions of our people who are still walking the streets of this country with empty pockets and no jobs.

There is now in effect a trade agreement between the United States and Belgium, proclaimed on April 1, 1935. It embraces reductions in duty on most of the important commodities exported from Belgium to the United States.

On August 16, 1939, the Department of State announced negotiations for a new trade agreement with Belgium. Such notice was accompanied by a list of products to be considered for possible granting of concessions by the United States. Included therein were all products on which concessions had already been made in the 1935 agreement with Belgium, plus substantially all products which had been included in the trade agreement with Czechoslovakia terminated as of April 22, 1939, following recognition by the United States of de facto administrative control of Czechoslovakia by Germany. We have no commercial agreement with Germany.

September 27, 1939, was the closing date for filing briefs of interested parties in connection with this new Belgium trade agreement; and public hearings were held before the Committee for Reciprocity Information during the week of October 9, 1939.

On September 5, 1939, the President proclaimed that a state of war exists between Germany and France, Poland, and the United Kingdom, and invoked the provisions of the Neutrality Act. Thereafter such proclamation was supplemented by a further proclamation on November 4, 1939, forbidding all vessels of United States registry from entering a prescribed belligerent area, which included all seaports of Belgium.

Protests were filed with the Department of State against continuance of negotiations under the foregoing conditions, which protests to date have been ignored.

Meanwhile Belgium from time to time has placed restrictions upon its foreign trade, including substantially all the articles exported to or imported from the United States.

Whether or not Belgium be drawn into the pending European war this action has already had a pronounced effect upon economic conditions in the United States, and more particularly in Belgium. Conditions are changing almost daily. The future is wholly unpredictable.

Certainly no basis today exists upon which to predicate any intelligent appraisal of the effects upon the economy of the United States or any section thereof, or upon individual manufacturers and importers, of any further changes in tariff duties affecting our importations from Belgium. Existing conditions preclude any added benefits to our export trade. The length of the existing European war is unknown. Whenever its termination and whatever its outcome the trade of the world in general, and foreign trade between any European country, whether or not a belligerent, and the United States must be based upon wholly different conditions and changed conceptions than those which exist today, or those which existed on October 9, 1939.

The State Department has steadfastly refused or neglected to clarify its position with respect to the continuance or conclusion of the pending negotiations for a new trade agreement with Belgium. This continuing uncertainty is harmful to all business interests, whether importers, manufacturers, or exporters. The businessmen of the United States are entitled to know the policy of that Department in administering the powers delegated by the Congress.

We should like to know whether or not the State Department contemplates dropping all negotiations and all thought of a new agreement with Belgium until the end of the present European conflict.

Now what about the constitutionality of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act? I am not a lawyer, but I can read the English language, and when the Constitution of the United States plainly says that treaties must be ratified by the Senate, I do not think that we can make treaties, call them agreements, and get around the law. If we assume the constitutionality of section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, what about the requirements set down in subparagraph (A) as necessary to be complied with prior to the conclusion of a trade pact? Before the President can enter into a foreign trade agreement he must find "as a fact that any existing duty of the United States or any other foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States and that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the means specified."

Mr. President, the reports upon which these findings are based have never been made public. They may exist, but I have never seen them. To the extent that they may be defective, the trade negotiations based upon them would appear to be null and void. Why was it that the framers of our Constitution set forth that treaties negotiated with foreign nations should be subject to ratification? It was obviously not for purposes of secrecy. It was obviously to give the public a chance to have a hearing.

Oh, we are told that a variety of agencies enter into the negotiation of a trade treaty, but if you are a pottery maker or a cotton manufacturer, or anything else, for all practical purposes you are merely told that a new rate is going into effect, and the rest lies with you—to sink or swim—when the products of your business may be placed in competition with cheap imported products of like character.

The most striking example of this disparity in the method of accounting is the one I shall now quote:

> In 1939 we exported 7,576,391 metal-filament light bulbs at an average value of 12 cents per bulb. Then we turned around and imported during the same period 84,296,063 light bulbs on which an import value of only 8 mills per light bulb was placed.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. Did the Senator ascertain the differential in wages between those paid the people who made the imported light bulbs and those who made the American bulbs?

Mr. BRIDGES. I have not the exact figures here, but I looked the matter up at one time, and wages, roughly speaking, amounted to an average of $5 a day in this country, as contrasted with a wage, where the bulbs are made abroad, of around 60 cents a day. The difference may vary a little from that, but that is essentially the ratio, about 9 to 1.

Mr. DAVIS. It is similar to the comparison in the case of other articles which were brought into this country, the differential between the wages paid in this country and those paid in foreign countries being very great in nearly every industry.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is absolutely correct.

It is possible to pick out hundreds of similarly competitive articles from the report of the Department of Commerce for November 1939. It is hardly necessary to point out what a difference it makes in our thinking to go a little deeper than the dollar value of imports when studying the foreign trade situation.

It is my earnest hope that the reciprocal-trade policy may be debated fully once and for all at this time, and that it may be debated on its merits, and not amidst a confusion of propaganda of one sort or another. If we throw out the propaganda, if we say to ourselves that here is a proposal which, if passed, will represent the will of the American people as a piece of permanent legislation, and then proceed to debate the issue on the merits, I, for one, will certainly abide by the final decision.

Is it misleading, or is it not, to make such statements as these—and again I quote Mr. Hull:

> The choice before us is whether we shall lead the way toward the slough of despair and ruin for ourselves and others or toward the heights of economic progress, sustained prosperity, and enduring peace for our Nation and for the world.

Mr. President, is it not obvious to anyone who is not lulled into unconsciousness by platitudes that this is not the issue at all? Naturally we all want prosperity and peace, but whether or not this country shall have peace or the world shall have peace has nothing whatever to do with the Hull Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. Regardless of that fact, I might vote for the extension of the act if I thought that it had some small bearing on the question of world peace, but I am convinced that it has not in the past, does not in the present, and will not in the future.

What have been the results of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act on our domestic economics? During the life of the trade-agreements program duties have been reduced on more than a thousand commodities—on 42 percent of our dutiable imports. I quote those figures from the House minority report. Those reductions represent an average cut of 39 percent. Yet I have still to hear of one case in which the duty was raised on any article. The administration then, I take it, has found no instance in which they felt it necessary to raise a duty to safeguard any American producer.

In my own New England, trading has always been characteristic. That section was built up by trading, and there we have respect for a good horse trader. We believe in trading and in reciprocity. I believe in reciprocity, and to me that means give and take. But these agreements have been nearly all give with no take. American farmers and workers and producers are generally being sold down the river.

Mr. President, there has never been an administration so prolific as this one in turning out slogans to fit every case. They have one to fit the case for the trade agreements. The catch phrase is "Trade is a two-way street." Of course trade is a two-way street, and we are in business at one end of it. Yet, while the proponents talk about trade being a two-way street, they have made a one-way street of it and traffic is not going our way.

As good traders, we never set our competitors up in business if we wanted to be able to stay in business ourselves. Yet, under this policy, we do set up these competitors in business. The Export-Import Bank has made loans to Brazil, to Poland, to Nicaragua, to China, to name but a few. We make loans to trade-agreement nations.

Perhaps, however, that is getting off the two-way street into a side alley. It is not a criticism of the trade-agreements program exclusively. However, the operation of these pseudo-reciprocal agreements, and that alone, has raised up a crop of competitors where none grew before. Probably it is the only crop the administration has not tried to control.

The administration, we are told, has been at great pains to conclude agreements with the country which is our principal supplier of the commodity on which a concession is to be made. In that way the administration hopes to get a measure of reciprocity in spite of the most-favored-nation clause. It hopes to get us something, at least, in return for our concessions.

Let me cite just three examples, Mr. President, from among the dozens which can be found in the Tariff Commission's report to the Finance Committee of the Senate. That report shows any number of cases in which, after a concession was granted, the country which obtained the concession ceased to be the principal source of imports, and some other country, or countries, became the principal source of imports.

A good illustration of this is crude sperm oil, dutiable under paragraph 52. The duty is reduced from 10 cents a gallon to 5 cents a gallon under the flexible provision of the Tariff Act of 1930, and was reduced from 5 cents to 2½ cents a gallon in the Canadian reciprocal-trade agreement. That agreement became effective the 1st of January 1936. Three years later, in 1939, we imported $586,000 worth of crude sperm oil and only $1,000 worth was imported from Canada.

Here is another illustration, and keep in mind the cotton situation in this country. This time the reciprocal-trade agreement had been concluded with the United Kingdom. The duty on a certain kind of cotton cloth is reduced from 10 percent to 5 percent. That agreement went into effect the 1st day of January 1939, and in that year—the first year of the agreement—the imports from the United Kingdom were only $108,000 out of a total of $572,000. In other words, $464,000 worth of the imports of this cloth came in from other foreign countries, without the United States having obtained from any of them any concessions whatever to compensate for the benefits which they obtained from us. If the Senate will bear with me for one more illustration, I will refer to the Tariff Commission's report for 100 more like it.

In the reciprocal-trade agreements with Switzerland and the United Kingdom, duties were reduced on another kind of cotton cloth containing silk, rayon, and other synthetic textiles. In 1939 only $4,000, out of $287,000 worth imported, came from either Switzerland or the United Kingdom. Almost the entire amount of the imports of that year came from countries other than those with which the agreements were made. The other countries which sold that cloth in the American market obtained our concession to do it. They obtained it gratis and without granting us any concession whatsoever in exchange for it. And yet this is called trading on a two-way street.

As I have said, I believe in trading and in real reciprocity. At the same time, it is one thing to make a treaty with our friends in Canada, where the people believe in our democratic principles and where standards are high. It is another thing to take the concessions we have made to our friends in fair trade and generalize them to the world. It is another thing to make those concessions apply also, for example, to troublesome Mexico, on the south, where the workers are peons, or to countries like Russia, where the peasants no longer live under the Czars, and cannot tell the difference because the standards are still so low.

I have traveled around this country of ours, and I have seen enough of the standards under which Americans live to know what they are worth. I have seen the best of the conditions and the worst, and even the worst of conditions in America have worlds of distance to go before they sink to the level of living in those countries whose coolie-made goods we are welcoming into the American market. Reciprocity is one thing, but my vote is never going to be given to put the workingmen of my State and of my country on the same plane with the peons of Mexico and South America and the peasants of Europe.

The trade-treaty program is said to be part and parcel of the New Deal. I am prepared to believe that. It contradicts the New Deal's domestic policies of restricting crops and increasing the cost of industrial production; but I have seen so many contradictions in this administration's policy that they no longer surprise me.

I cannot, however, agree to a policy which results in the importing of agricultural products to swell the surpluses we already have in this country; certainly not when at the same time frantic efforts are being made to reduce those surpluses, and to deny American farmers the use of American acres which might grow the same crops we import.

Recently, the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, at the close of his remarks in support of the trade-agreements program, had inserted in the RECORD two letters, one from President Taft, and one from President Theodore Roosevelt. In his remarks he had referred to these letters as evidencing support of the sort of reciprocal-trade agreement this administration advocates.

Both those letters referred to a trade agreement with Canada which was concluded by the Taft administration. Let me quote just one line from each of the letters. President Taft said:

> Possibly labor is slightly lower in some parts of Canada than in the United States, but it is also higher in some parts and the adoption of free trade would rapidly increase the cost of labor and those parts where it is cheaper in Canada, so that the conditions would be the same.

President Theodore Roosevelt said:

> As you say, labor cost is substantially the same in the two countries, so that you are amply justified by the platform.

Mr. President, both those distinguished men were in favor of maintaining the American standard of living, and, if possible, raising it still higher. At that time the United States was about to conclude a trade agreement with a country whose standards were high. It was not a proposal to place the American workingman or the American farmer in competition with the coolies of China and India and the peons of South America and Mexico.

What could be said in favor of that old and truly reciprocal-trade agreement with Canada cannot likewise now be said of the trade-agreements policy of this administration.

It is possible to cloak the plain fact that we are placing high standard American labor in competition with low standard labor in other countries by the simple trick of figuring imports only on dollar value. The dollar value of a product imported from a low standard country may be low, but that import may displace many times its own volume in a similar product which could have otherwise been produced here and sold here at our high standards.

I read from the hearings before the House Committee on Ways and Means, when Assistant Secretary of State Grady appeared:

> Mr. KNUTSON. Dr. Grady, if you knew that a nation was in default in its war debts to the United States, or in their obligations to nationals of this country in large sums, and that nation, to all intents and purposes, was bankrupt; if you knew that living standards, working conditions, wages, were far below those enjoyed by the average American workingman, would you consider it good business for this country to enter into a share-the-wealth program with such a country by means of trade agreements?
> Mr. GRADY. Of course, it is not a share-the-wealth program in any sense at all. You have two questions there. I think one is with regard to whether other countries owe us money. I think one of the best chances we have of getting it back is to have trade with such a country, because then they can build up their dollars here with which to pay their obligations. You will have a far better chance, in other words, of their paying and getting out of default with us if you have trade flowing than if you don't. I don't see how you improve the situation of getting paid by not having trade agreements.

It is brutally true that the policy of the present administration in regard to the trade-agreements policy, while it is gloriously idealistic, has yet to show really practical results that benefit this country. It has served only to worry business, big and little; to starve our farmers; to make our workers lose their jobs; to block initiative; and to stop the expansion of industry.

I firmly believe that in pursuing this policy Mr. Hull is taking the responsibility onto his own shoulders for forcing American workingmen—farmers, manufacturers, and industrialists—to compete with people of other lands who work for pitifully small wages and live under conditions which we in America cannot countenance.

In conclusion, Mr. President, let me say that the only kind of a reciprocity program of trade agreements for which I can vote is the old New England kind, which includes both give and take. That does not mean to give away American standards and to force peasant life on our people.

Therefore I want to offer what I believe to be constructive amendments designed to meet my sincere criticisms, and to safeguard the standards and rights of our people, which I firmly believe are endangered by this policy as it now stands.

In addition to the other amendments which my distinguished colleagues have offered, I merely want to see that—

First. Our producers, farmers, workers, and manufacturers are given notice of commodities to be considered in any prospective agreement so that they may plan the basis of their policy accordingly.

I merely want to insure that—

Second. Our producers, farmers, workers, and manufacturers have the opportunity to have their views heard as to how a prospective agreement will affect them.

And particularly I want to see that—

Third. Our producers, farmers, workers, and manufacturers act as a check to see that any prospective agreement will not allow the importation of foreign commodities at a price with which, according to our standards, they cannot compete.

And, lastly, I want to insure with an amendment that—

Fourth. The United States, by negotiating a treaty with one country, will not be giving concessions to the whole world without receiving value in return.

If these amendments are adopted, or if others are adopted which provide the safeguards I want to see written into the law, then I will vote for the joint resolution. But if the trade-agreements program remains as it stands, endangering our standard of living, and presenting an unjustifiable abdication of the constitutional duties of this body to one man, from whose decision there is no appeal, then I will vote against the extension of the act.

Mr. President, in closing I may say that I have been in all sections of this country; I have been in over 40 States; and probably Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull and the New Deal cannot do the Republican Party any greater service than by jamming through this reciprocal-trade measure, as they have attempted to do and are attempting to do now, for the people, as a whole, are against this trade-treaty program. They know what it is doing and can do to the Nation.

Mr. President, I want to make a prediction here on the floor of the Senate that Mr. Roosevelt, or Mr. Hull, or anyone else who advocates or supports this measure as it is, without any safeguard, and then goes before the country as the Democratic nominee for President, is going to be surprised at the number of States in the Union he will lose on this issue alone. I wish to make the same prediction with respect to the Republicans; that if the Republican Party should nominate a candidate who straddled on the reciprocal trade agreements program, or who upholds or favors the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act without proper safeguards, the Republicans will lose many States they would otherwise carry, particularly in the Middle West and the far West.

Mr. President, this is a vital issue which concerns the American standard of living. It concerns the livelihood of men and women in this Nation. It concerns the living standards of the average workingman of America, and what he can do for his family. It concerns the average farmer in the same way.

We are fighting not merely for theories; we are fighting to maintain an American standard of living for Americans in America, and I, for one, care a great deal more about that than I care about aiding the Bolsheviks in Russia and the peons in Mexico on our south and people in other lands that Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull and a few more of the idealistic and impractical leaders of the New Deal seem to care about in fostering the reciprocal trade agreements program.

Unless this trade-agreement measure has some very effective safeguards such as contained in the amendments I have submitted, I must vote against the continuance of the act, for the best interests of the Nation as a whole.

Mr. President, I ask that three amendments heretofore submitted by me, and intended to be proposed to the pending joint resolution, be printed in full in the RECORD at this point as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the amendments were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> At the end of the joint resolution insert the following new section:
> "SEC. —. Hereafter, before any foreign trade agreement is negotiated, amended, renewed, or extended with any foreign government or instrumentality thereof under such section 350, public hearings shall be held in the District of Columbia with respect to each such agreement to be so negotiated, amended, renewed, or extended, and all interested persons shall be given an opportunity at such hearing to present their views. Notice of such hearings together with a detailed statement of all matters to be considered therein shall be published in the Federal Register once a week for 12 consecutive weeks prior to the commencement of such hearings. A record of the proceedings at such public hearings shall be made and such record shall be the basis of the treatment of all articles to be covered by such agreement, or amendment, renewal, or extension thereof. No article shall be covered by any such agreement, or amendment, renewal, or extension thereof, unless such record contains substantial evidence that such article should be included therein in the public interest."

At the end of the joint resolution insert the following new section:

"SEC. —. No foreign trade agreement shall hereafter be concluded, amended, renewed, or extended with any foreign government or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of such section 350, unless the tariffs or import duties upon the articles encompassed in such agreement, or amendment, renewal, or extension thereof, shall be maintained at a point which will at least equalize the difference in the cost of production thereof in the country dealt with and the United States, as determined by the United States Tariff Commission as of the date such agreement, or amendment, renewal, or extension thereof, becomes effective."

At the end of the joint resolution insert the following new section:

"SEC. —. (a) The last two sentences of paragraph (2) of section 350 (a) of such act of June 12, 1934, are amended to read as follows: 'The proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall be in effect from and after such time as is specified in the proclamation. The President may at any time terminate any such proclamation in whole or in part.'

"(b) Hereafter, every foreign trade agreement, or amendment, renewal, extension, or modification of any foreign trade agreement, entered into under such section 350 shall contain a provision that any advantage of whatsoever kind which either contracting party may extend to any other foreign government or instrumentality thereof shall simultaneously and unconditionally, without request and without compensation, be extended to the other contracting party."

ATTITUDE OF UNITED STATES TOWARD EUROPEAN WAR

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, yesterday the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT] commented on certain incidents that had taken place of late, to wit: The speech of our Minister to Canada, Mr. Cromwell, and the speech of the attorney general of Ontario; from the remarks of these two gentlemen he drew the conclusion that we were drifting toward war.

Apparently the statements of Mr. Cromwell and the minister of Ontario considerably upset my distinguished colleague. My purpose in making these remarks is not to disagree with him in relation to the serious situation in the United States and abroad, but I feel that the statements of these men can be compared to a boil which has come to the surface. These gentlemen have exposed their cards. They have shown their views. The fact that our Minister to Canada spoke as he did apparently exposed his personal convictions in the matter. The same can be said about the attorney general of Ontario. So what have we as the result of these two exposures?

First, in relation to Minister Cromwell's speech we have the Secretary of State calling him down—that is, calling his attention to the fact that as a Minister of this country he has violated the rules of the game.

Secondly, if the speech was premeditated and made with the purpose of trying to find out what the sentiment of the majority of the people in this country was—well, it was productive of result. The reaction of the vast majority of the press and the people was that Cromwell had spoken out of turn; that he did not express the opinion of a large percentage of the American people.

Mr. President, when I landed in New York last September I remember picking up an American newspaper, and one of the first things that came to my attention was the Gallup poll of a few days before. The Gallup poll then showed, as I remember it, in answer to a question, that 44 percent of the American people were then willing, in case it appeared that England and France were being defeated, virtually to join the Allies—that is, to send ships and men.

The most recent Gallup poll on that subject shows that instead of 44 percent the percentage has gone down to 24 percent, indicating that the American people were thinking.

Therefore I reach a conclusion different from that which my distinguished colleague from West Virginia has reached. I say we are not drifting toward war. We are marching toward a cooler appraisement of the real situation. We are recognizing that as a great people set apart we can render the greatest service to the combatant nations and to the future of the race by keeping out of that war. No, Mr. President, we are not marching toward war. We are becoming more level-headed, and by "we" I do not mean some of the scatterbrains; I mean the general average of the American people. Becoming more level-headed, we are becoming more able to distinguish between what is fact and what is fiction, between what is good and what is evil propaganda.

Mr. President, because we are becoming more judicial in our thinking, we necessarily are less prone to become mentally stampeded. We have our feet on the ground; we will not become the creatures of hysteria nor go off on an emotional jag.

As a consequence of a better mental perspective we are calling upon all our citizens to be American-minded, and we are becoming more realistic in dealing with those citizens who are European-minded.

Let me repeat the last statement. As a consequence of our level-headedness—I call it perspective—we are calling upon American citizens everywhere to become more American-minded, and we are becoming more realistic in dealing with those citizens who are European-minded.

No, Mr. President; Mr. Cromwell's statement did no harm. It did good, because it exposed a condition that we must check. Every one of our representatives to foreign nations, because of the Cromwell incident, will be, we hope, better Americans. But if there are representatives of America in Europe who have become so mentally unfit for their jobs because of their prejudice against one of the combatant nations, or prejudice for one of the combatant nations, such representative should be recalled.

What I am trying to make clear here, Mr. President, is that there is an American point of view separate and distinct from the European point of view, and only men—of course, they can have their sympathies—only men who place America first, who are not inoculated with the idea that it is our business to settle European problems, who are not affected with "the meddler's itch," should represent this country in these perilous times in the chancelries of other nations.

In the last World War we know what certain of our representatives abroad did. We know that they—and history so records—were great factors in educating this country to the notion that Europe's fight was our fight. I am not going to review the story of our Ambassador to the Court of St. James. I know that he thought he was doing right. But, Mr. President, he exemplifies what I am talking about. He was a great factor in accomplishing what the attorney general of Ontario asked his Canadian brethren to accomplish, to wit, to get America into the war.

I repeat, that what he said I think was a wholesome thing. It was good that he spoke out. He spoke out, Mr. President, as you would speak, as I would speak if we were Canadians or if we were Englishmen. I want everyone who is an American to realize that there is a distinction between being an American and being an Englishman or a Canadian. If I were a Canadian or an Englishman I would want to get America to help in this great war. But, Mr. President, I am an American, and, while I believe that a large percentage of the American people sympathize with the cause of the Allies, I say decidedly that I do not want any American to represent this country abroad who has the same attitude of mind that the attorney general of Ontario has.

I do not want this Nation to get into that war. In my opinion any American citizen—and I refer not merely to officials in Congress but to every citizen in every village, hamlet, and city in the country—who does not take every possible step to keep America out of war is remiss in his obligation to the Nation, and to the generations of the Nation which are yet to come.

To recapitulate, Mr. President:

First. We do not want this country to be represented by ministers or ambassadors who are Cromwell-minded.

Second. Because we know that Canada and the Allies want us as partners in their enterprise, we shall be especially on our guard not to be influenced to become allies.

Third. Within our own borders we shall protect ourselves against the infiltration of foreign "isms" which may weaken our resolve, and we shall expect the foreigner in our midst to observe the rules applicable to a guest, namely, to live and think in the American way. I repeat that: In these times we expect every foreigner who lives in our midst to live and think in the American way. To those Americans who find that living and thinking in the American way is not good enough for them in these challenging times, but who must spew forth foreign "isms" and propaganda, we shall simply say: "Cease your wicked and unholy purpose. We know how to deal with termites."

Fourth. We are not drifting toward war, Mr. President. Our sails are set. Our bark is pursuing a splendidly safe course under the direction of our pilot, and that pilot is the American people under the American Constitution.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Calloway, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 2609) to reimpose the trust on certain lands allotted to Indians of the Crow Tribe, Montana.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 8471. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Susquehanna River, at or near Wyalusing, between Terry and Wyalusing Townships, in the county of Bradford, and in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; and

H. R. 9209. An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 8471. H. R. 9209. An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into, after the hour of 1 o'clock no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes on any amendment, amendment thereto, or substitute therefor, to House Joint Resolution 407.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, this morning while the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] was discussing his amendment, I directed several questions to him with respect to the extent to which his amendment covers agricultural products. As drafted, the amendment refers solely to the agricultural products which are mentioned in schedule 7 of the Tariff Act of 1930. There are numerous other agricultural products which are not included in section 7 upon which there are tariff duties.

I have conferred with the Senator from Minnesota, and I understand that he and I are in agreement that his amendment should be broad enough to cover all purely agricultural products. I therefore desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, which amendment I send to the desk.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I understand that the Senator's amendment to the amendment extends the protection to agricultural products only.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is all. My amendment to the amendment does not include the manufactures of agricultural products.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, my intention in offering the amendment and in accepting the Senator's amendment to my amendment is to stop the attack upon the income of the American farmer for the benefit of industry and foreign producers at the expense of the American farmer. I accept the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I think that a curious anomaly has developed in the activity under the Tariff Act. High tariffs were originally demanded primarily by manufacturers for the purpose of raising the prices of manufactured products and excluding the manufactures of foreign countries.

Those high tariffs were attacked in the past upon the ground that they contributed to the creation of trusts and the exploitation of the masses of the people. Agricultural products were not covered by any tariffs at all, but, beginning with the Fordney-McCumber Act, a feeling developed among the farmers and agriculturists of the country that agriculture should likewise have protection, since, apparently, it was impossible to cut down the high tariffs which Congress authorized on manufactured products.

Now, curiously enough, largely by reason of the development of technology, American manufacturers are able to turn out their products at a very low cost and they have become, as it were, independent of the tariff, so that in some instances the very industries which 15 or 20 years ago were demanding high industrial tariffs are now demanding low industrial tariffs, and the farmer has begun to feel that his interests are being bargained off for the purpose of enabling the manufacturer to gather in a world market. In other words, in the beginning, when industrial tariffs were being built up, the farmer was being victimized in order that tariffs might be raised; today the farmer feels that he is being victimized in order that industrial tariffs may be cut down. The purpose of the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, modified by the amendment which is now offered, and which, I understand, he accepts, is merely to protect the producer of agricultural products from the sacrifice of his interests in order to purchase a world market for the products of industry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Minnesota accepts the amendment to the amendment, which modifies his amendment?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, may the modification be reported to the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In line 6, after the word "State", in the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota it is proposed to strike out the remainder of line 6, all of line 7, and insert a period and the following:

As used in this section, the term "agricultural products" includes any product or article classified as agricultural in "Schedule A, statistical classification of imports into the United States," effective January 1, 1939, as issued by the Department of Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], as modified.

Mr. O'MAHONEY and Mr. DAVIS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

So Mr. SHIPSTEAD's amendment, as modified, was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, I have on the desk an amendment which I offer, and request that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. —. (a) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (b) of section 2 of the act entitled "An act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930," approved June 12, 1934, as amended and supplemented, each foreign-trade agreement entered into after the date of enactment of this joint resolution under the provisions of section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, shall contain a provision providing that such agreement shall automatically terminate upon a date not later than June 12, 1943. Whenever any such agreement terminates as a result of the operation of any such provision, any proclamation issued by the President under the provisions of such section 350 for the purpose of carrying out such agreement shall no longer be effective.

(b) The President is requested to give notice, not later than December 12, 1942, to each of the foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof with which the United States at such time has a foreign-trade agreement, concluded under the provisions of such section 350 before the date of enactment of this joint resolution and of which notice of intention to terminate has not been theretofore given, that the United tates is desirous of terminating such agreement on June 12, 1943. The President shall thereafter take such further action as may be necessary to terminate any such agreement on June 12, 1943. Upon the termination of any such agreement, any proclamation issued by the President under the provisions of such section 350 for the purpose of carrying out such agreement shall no longer be effective.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, it is not my intention to engage in a lengthy debate on this amendment. From the reading of the amendment, its object is obvious. Briefly, it is to require that trade agreements made under the authorization of the extension of the present Trade Agreements Act shall be terminated at the time the authorization itself terminates. I do not know that any further explanation is necessary.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I intend, when in order, to offer an amendment limiting to 1 year the continuation of these trade agreements. What I want to say on this subject will require more than 15 minutes, however; and I should like to take the 15 minutes allotted to me in connection with the amendment of the Senator from Oregon to express in part my views.

I have written what I wish to say, first of all because I desire to limit myself to 15 minutes; second, because I consider the subject of special importance.

Mr. President, as is well known, I do not very often discuss public questions from a political standpoint; but, in addition to the reasons which I shall later give for the amendment I intend to offer, I want to refer to some political aspects of this whole question.

In my opinion, at the present time in the United States there are two questions that transcend party lines. One is the fixed, determined, adamant state of mind of an overwhelming number of the American people against our involvement in the European war. When war first broke out in Europe, the press was replete with articles discussing the question whether or not it was possible for us to avoid involvement in the war. Several prominent citizens publicly declared that we should enter the war at once and not wait until we had to enter it at a later date. Our people were jittery, wondering what influences and forces might sweep us into the European war. Indeed, it was predicted here and there that we would be in the war within 6 months or a year.

What a changed situation we find today. Not a single public man of any influence in the country dares today repeat what he said at the outset of the war, suggesting that it was our duty to take sides with the democracies and enter the European war. Not an editorial can be found in any newspaper from one end of the country to the other favoring our entry into the war.

The plain people of America have demonstrated that when once they are aroused they are a mighty, potent force in controlling public opinion. The mothers of American sons, American youths, and the fathers, mothers, sisters, and brothers, working in the factories, out on the farms, behind the counters, at the desks, in the counting rooms, have instinctively come together and squelched whatever sentiment was being expressed in favor of our participation. In the coming election the issue will be not so much, "who kept us out of war" but "who is most certain to keep us out of war." In my opinion, the next President of the United States is most likely to be the candidate who from one end of this country to the other demonstrates his interest first and foremost in peace for America, and the preservation of our own democracy here in America, and militantly opposes our involvement in the European war.

This is somewhat aside from what I wanted to say at this time, but it is related to the second issue, which I believe transcends party lines, namely, the issue of unemployment. It is not unemployment relief—generous, liberal, unstinted aid and assistance by the Federal Government to those in need because of inability through no fault of their own to obtain employment. That issue has already been answered by the electorate. More than anything else it gave the Democratic Party an overwhelming victory in 1936. In the public mind the matter of sufficient appropriation for fundamental relief is assured. There may be some criticism of the method of administration, but all parties, all men, and all groups agree now that this is a permanent and continuous obligation.

The issue that remains in connection with the matter of unemployment is what is being done to lessen unemployment and what is being done to increase unemployment, and if a case can be made out that the Democratic Party has contributed, or is contributing, through any of its policies to unemployment in this country, it will, in my opinion, be most injurious.

The Republicans are aware of this issue. Their united opposition to the reciprocal-trade agreements is based upon the belief that they can make out a case that it has increased unemployment and threatens more unemployment in this country. A substantial number of Democrats, who dislike to differ with their party leadership and who exert every effort to support their regular party program, are fearful of this issue as evidenced by the votes cast here. They are not voting against a continuation of the reciprocal-trade agreements because of personal reasons. They are voting against them because they are convinced that back home there is a strong and growing sentiment in opposition to these agreements; that they are not operating for the welfare of their constituents; and that means they are not a political asset. That is the attitude of many Democrats on this side of the Chamber, as I interpret it.

What can we do constructively? First and foremost, we can limit to 1 year the further extension of these agreements. This will be no repudiation by the Congress of the general policy or disapproval of the experiment. It will indicate that the Congress will, between now and another year, try to remove the complaints to which I have referred, and bring about more liberal action in making use of the "escape" clause in these agreements; and secondly, will remove the other objection by providing approval by the Congress, limited in character, and of such a nature as to permit advice from the Congress to its agency in the executive department about policies which the Congress may be convinced are detrimental to American workers and American producers.

The tariff issue is a very ticklish one. The American people have a sensitive strain in regard to tariff legislation. Politically, tariff making has been injurious to the political party sponsoring the legislation. Democrats experienced in the congressional elections of 1914 vigorous opposition from the country after the enactment of the Underwood tariff bill. The Republicans lost tremendously in the congressional elections following adoption of various tariff bills. There are signs that our party may have the same experience in the forthcoming election—not so much in the election of the President, in my opinion, as in the congressional elections—and I cannot explain the united opposition of the Republicans and the opposition of many Democrats in this Chamber in any other way. Indeed, I have heard it predicted that the loss of Democratic seats in the Congress would be very great as a result of opposition throughout the country to these trade agreements.

I heard it said we would carry hardly a State west of the Mississippi River. These communications are from Democrats. Why are they disturbed? Why are they voting as they are? It is because they know the sentiment back home, and they know what the Republican Party is going to do in the next election.

Let me give two illustrations of what I mean by political effect. I have received many letters in opposition to this program, and they have all come from people who are producers. I have received many letters in favor of the legislation, but comparatively few from domestic producers. I have received the following telegram:

BOSTON, MASS., April 3, 1940.

DAVID I. WALSH,
Senator from Massachusetts,
Washington, D. C.:

We cannot call to your attention too strongly the extreme disadvantages for ourselves, as well as for the entire American patent-leather industry, resulting from the Canadian trade agreement. As a result of the reduction in the United States' duty to 7½ percent, the 1939 imports of Canadian patent leather show a tremendous increase, and the Canadian currency depreciation has further aggravated an already serious situation.

All plants are shut down, throwing over 1,000 men out of work, and this is the first time in 15 years that we have shut down our plants. Imperative that some immediate action be taken to stop Canadian imports if we are to continue in business.

COLONIAL TANNING CO., INC.

Let me ask my colleagues, how many votes will a Democratic candidate for Congress get in that community, with a thousand men unemployed, if the cause is, as alleged, the reciprocal-trade agreement? We have been unwilling to admit that, though there have been good results, there is a chance for improvement, but continue to take the position, "The law cannot be improved, take it as it is." Extend it for another year, is my suggestion, to see if we cannot provide some machinery which will remove this objection?

I have another communication, from a manufacturer of musical instruments. I shall only take the time to read it in part:

The Quartermaster Department of Philadelphia has purchased, and as far as I know will continue to purchase, musical instruments made in foreign countries when they are offered at approximately 25 percent less than American manufacturers can supply them.

A specific instance is quoted. The Philadelphia Quartermaster Department purchased, between August and November 1939, cymbals made by the K. Zildjian Co., of Istanbul, Turkey, to the approximate amount of $500. Previously, cymbals made by the Avedis Zildjian Co., of Norfolk Downs, Quincy, Mass., had been purchased. They were offered to the Quartermaster Department in competition with the Turkish cymbals, but on account of the price the Turkish cymbals were taken.

In the late reciprocity agreement with Turkey, the duty on cymbals was reduced from 40 percent to 20 percent, thus enabling this low price to be quoted. The Avedis Zildjian Co., in which I am personally interested, was established here 10 or 12 years ago by Avedis Zildjian, a member of the Zildjian family of Istanbul, who had made cymbals for hundreds of years. Avedis Zildjian claims that he paid for labor in Turkey in making the cymbals, in 1913, the equivalent of $2 per week. The present rate for labor is from $3 to $3.50 per week. The Zildjian Co., at present, in Quincy, Mass., pays to its labor from $35 to $50 per week.

The facts speak for themselves. Radical reductions have been made in wood-wind musical instruments. Our trade has been affected by the reductions in tariff which have been enjoyed principally by countries other than those to which trade concessions were given, particularly Italy.

The purpose of this letter, however, is to show you that, as far as our business is concerned—we employ from 200 to 250 people—Mr. Hull's experimental trade agreements are a headache, and if continued will, I am sure, develop into a serious condition, especially when the war ends.

Mr. President, for the present I shall not discuss this question further, but the uncertainty as to who will administer the law, the uncertainty as to the agency which Congress may name to administer the law, I will discuss when I have a chance to get the floor after the amendment shall have been voted on. However, I say in all sincerity to my Democratic colleagues, at times a majority of whom have expressed disapproval of these trade agreements to halt. Let us not go before the country and say, "There are no faults; there have been no mistakes; there is nothing to correct; the policy is sound; Congress has abandoned its task to the Executive."

Mr. President, I leave the issue to the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, like the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts, I call upon my colleagues on this side of the Chamber to consider and examine carefully the question before us before casting their votes. Some of us who are members of the committee which considered the pending legislation, who sat through the extensive hearings, heard the scores of witnesses who appeared before the Finance Committee, and many of us read the testimony and briefs that were presented by witnesses before the Ways and Means Committee of the House. Running through most of the testimony there seemed to me to be an overwhelming—a predominant—sentiment expressed by representatives of various organizations for the continuation of the present reciprocal trade agreements program. Indeed, throughout the hearings there was little criticism of the trade agreements, and much praise for the manner and methods employed by those who have participated in the negotiation of these trade agreements. As I have said before, we heard little about actual injury, but much about fear of what might happen in the future.

Of course, representatives of the great livestock organizations appeared before us, as they have done every time a tariff measure has been under consideration. It was stated repeatedly before the committee that today cattle is one of the few agricultural commodities that is selling above parity.

Mr. PITTMAN. How long has that been?

Mr. HARRISON. I can give the Senator the figures. It is true that livestock is selling today above parity.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator knows that for years livestock has been selling below parity.

Mr. HARRISON. Before the reciprocal-trade agreements were in existence; yes; but——

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; and after the trade agreements were in existence.

Mr. HARRISON. If it is necessary, I will submit those figures before I finish. But the cattlemen today are receiving prices above parity for their livestock, as shown by their own witnesses and by the testimony of experts and official Government figures. Of course, representatives of the wool growers of the West appeared before the committee. We have not touched raw wool. There is the same tariff on wool today as was written in the last tariff measure in 1930. There was some criticism from some manufacturers of woolen goods in the East. But it did not strike us that there was any inequality in that respect because, as shown by the reports of the National Association of Woolen Manufacturers, 1939 was a banner year for the industry, and that was the only year in which concessions were in effect. We gave that and every other matter careful consideration.

Spokesmen for organizations representing a very large number of the women of the United States appeared before us and submitted statements and, with one exception, as I recall, all endorsed the continuation of the reciprocal trade agreements program.

Cotton has been brought into the discussion. Every organization I know of that has anything to do with cotton endorses the plan. They believe it keeps open the markets for our cotton and that it will help the cotton industry.

They also know that had it not been for the trade-agreements program the cotton growers, as well as all those engaged in the cotton business, would have been injured materially in the last few years.

One of the largest farm organizations in the country endorsed the program with the suggestion and the recommendation that the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Agriculture approve these agreements before they go into effect. That proposal was to some extent embodied in the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], which was debated thoroughly and rejected by the Senate.

The Senator from Massachusetts said there has been a change of sentiment in the country since this program was inaugurated and that there is more opposition to it now than there has been heretofore. Perhaps there has been some change of sentiment. I do not contend, nor does anyone else that I know of contend, that this program has been perfect, but I sincerely believe the method provides for the most orderly treatment of the tariff question, and that it has been of material benefit to our country.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts says the authorization should be limited to 1 year. We have now been engaged for 2 weeks in a fight to continue the trade-agreements program. We have been through 2 weeks of the most intense battling in which I have ever participated. Senators on the Republican side have lined up practically solid against this joint resolution and some Senators on the Democratic side, conscientiously opposed to the measure, have voted for every amendment which has been offered.

Of course it is a fight. I will not go further and say what other obstacles we are encountering, but I will say it is a real fight. Of course, in common with the Senator from Massachusetts, I want to see Democratic Senators look into the matter carefully, conscientiously, and vote their convictions. I know that from a political standpoint it may be injuring us more than it is our Republican brethren, because they are pretty solid over there, and we are somewhat divided over here. But I do not charge any bad motives on the part of any Senator on the other side, or on this side, in casting his vote. I take it that Senators vote their conscientious conviction. That is what every Senator should do.

From what the Senator from Massachusetts said, I imagine that he advocates the adoption of the pending amendment because it provides that when the existing trade agreements are completed we shall serve notice of their termination.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I did not discuss the amendment. I expect to vote against the amendment. I took up the time—I had only 15 minutes—on the general subject.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I understand; and I listened intently to the Senator because I have the highest respect for him. He is one of the best Democrats I know, one of the ablest men, and certainly one of my closest friends, and I always respect his views.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. But what are we up against? Here we have been for 2 weeks trying to pass this legislation. It is now proposed by some to limit the program to 1 year only. I read in the newspapers this morning that such a suggestion was being made. I will say nothing further about that, although I am somewhat prompted to do so. Enough!

I never tried to bring differences into my own party. But for 2 weeks we have been considering this resolution. Some persons say, "Let the program be continued for 1 year, and not for 3 years." Mr. President, if we did that, we would be laughed at by the world. Who would enter into an agreement with us if the program under which the agreement is to be made is simply to last for a year? That would be notice to the world that we have no faith in our own program. I would rather see the law killed now, if that is the purpose of some Senators, rather than have it extended for only a year. If such action was taken, it would necessitate having to go over the whole question again in the next session of Congress.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. If the agreement is merely extended for a year, 3-year agreements can still be made. In other words, it does not limit the agreements. Even then they do not expire automatically.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; for a year we can make agreements, but at the same time those with whom we are dealing are rather alert, and they will say, "Why, your own Congress did not have any faith in the program if the authority is to last only for a year." Mr. President, it sometimes takes a year or longer to negotiate a trade agreement. Representatives must possess the diplomatic suavity and instincts and the fine tactics of the Senator from Colorado to be able to come to an agreement in respect to these matters.

Mr. ADAMS. I should be highly gratified if I had 10 percent of the agreeable qualities possessed by the distinguished Senator, the chairman of the Finance Committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, I can return the compliment to the Senator.

Mr. ADAMS. May I again interrupt the Senator to add a word?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I am glad to yield.

Mr. ADAMS. Might not the fact that we have had a fight for some 2 weeks, and that the vote has been close, perhaps indicate that there may be some substantial doubt as to the soundness of the policy; and if there is this doubt, might it not be wise to give the matter further consideration? If the vote was all one way, it would indicate there was no genuine doubt about the matter.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator knows what would happen if the Republican Party were to come into control after the next election. And I deny what some of my colleagues say; I do not believe that the Republican Party is going to get control of this Government the coming election, and I am not trying to do anything to push it along and encourage the people of this country to believe that the signs point to it. I did not see the signs pointing to it in Wisconsin the other day. I do not know how those who write articles in newspapers or who give out statements can find that the results there show that the country is against us. Wisconsin used to go Republican by four or five hundred thousand votes, and the other day the two Democratic candidates received more votes than the two Republican candidates did in that State, with all the existing cross-currents. The President of the United States lacked just a few votes of receiving as many as all the others put together. I think that looks pretty good. The Republicans are mighty easy to please, when they get encouragement from the Wisconsin results. [Laughter.]

Senators, if the proposal to extend these agreements for a year is acted upon favorably, everyone will say, "Why, there was nothing to their program, so they were not willing to carry it on for 3 years."

If the Republicans get into control, one of the first things they will try to do is repeal the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act and leave the old Smoot-Hawley tariff law on the statute books. Some of my friends on this side probably will vote for that action, judging from the way they have been voting.

Mr. President, let us continue this matter for 3 years. Let those who believe in the policy vote to continue it for 3 years. Let those who do not believe in it vote against it. But let us show our belief in the policy and that we believe it should be continued.

That is all I desire to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I offer the amendment to which I referred a few moments ago; on page 1, line 7, of the joint resolution, to strike out the word "three" and insert the word "one."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 7, it is proposed to strike out "three" and insert "one."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I now desire to take 15 minutes to discuss my views on this amendment. I am presenting this amendment with the utmost sincerity and good faith—not with a view to embarrassing any of the proponents of the pending resolution, and not as an empty gesture. I am offering it in the belief that its justification and advantage will be at once apparent and that no reasonable objection lies to it. I am offering it as a friend of the temporary continuation of the reciprocal trade agreement authority, rather than as an opponent.

The debate in this Chamber and the various votes with respect to this matter have already clearly evidenced that a majority is unwilling to deny an extension of the existing delegation of authority from the Congress to the Executive, lest such a denial might be taken as a vote of censure of the reciprocal trade agreement program and a rebuke to the President and to Secretary Hull. I place myself in that group.

It has been clearly evidenced also that a majority has been favorable to some measure of restriction upon this delegation of authority, favorable to some reservation to Congress, but being unable unitedly to support any particular reservation, with the result that all the amendments so far offered have failed of adoption.

So it is evident as a practical matter that the joint resolution to extend the time limit in the delegation of this authority to the Executive, free of any restriction or reservation or power of review by Congress, will be adopted even though many on both sides of the aisle are uncertain what the future holds in store with respect to international trade and international trade agreements, and above all else, are reluctant, except for the most imperative necessity, to transfer from Congress to the Executive, even for a limited time, the authority, responsibility, and duty which the founding fathers of the Republic explicitly reposed in the Congress as the direct representatives of the people.

All this, I assert, is now self-evident, if we are willing to be candid and to review the discussion which has taken place, the views which have been expressed, and the votes which have been cast.

The pending joint resolution provides for a 3-year extension of the authority from its present expiration date in June of the present year. I submit that there is no valid or particular reason or theory for making the extension 3 years instead of 2, or 1, or 4, or 5.

The original delegation of authority was for a 3-year period, upon the supposition that an entire and complete series of reciprocal-trade agreements with all the countries of the world could be negotiated and completed within such a period of time. When such a result was not realized, Congress voted a 3-year extension, taking the 3-year unit without any particular reason and without any particular objection.

However, a 3-year extension from next June brings in a new factor and a new contingency which we cannot overlook or disregard. This delegation of authority is to the President. No one can now know who will be the President after the expiration of next January of the present term of the present occupant of the White House. It may be that circumstances and events will dictate Mr. Roosevelt's renomination. It may be that in such a contingency he will be reelected for a third term. It may be that the next President will be a Democrat pledged to a continuation of the policies of the present administration. It may be that the next President will be a Republican, whose views with respect to tariffs may be at wide variance with the doctrines of Secretary Hull.

We do not know. We cannot foresee. The point of the matter is the simple fact that if we leave the 3-year time limit in the joint resolution not only do we transfer to the Executive unrestricted authority of the most vital character but we are without any knowledge of what man, what set of men, or what political party will execute and administer the authority delegated to the President.

Why take so risky a step? Why the 3-year plan? What can we lose by making it 1 year? What is to prevent the Congress from granting a further extension next year if it then seems the desirable and prudent thing to do? Do we not trust ourselves to deal with this question justly and rationally a year hence?

We are told on every hand that the war in Europe is likely to be long drawn out. We know as a practical matter that the negotiation of new trade agreements at the present time is at a standstill. We are told that such trade agreements and the authority to make them may play an important part in post-war trade adjustments and the economic rehabilitation of Europe. But certainly we are in no position today to legislate for post-war adjustments which are beyond the horizon. If there should be occasion for it when peace comes, Congress could delegate to the Executive emergency powers with respect to foreign trade. But let us limit the present extension to 1 year.

A further analysis of the situation here and throughout the country discloses that many who formerly supported the trade agreements are now opposed to them; still others who may finally vote to continue them are passive and somewhat indifferent.

My distinguished and able friend the chairman of the committee [Mr. HARRISON] does not agree with me in that statement; but when I look back into the RECORD and find that at two sessions of the Congress similar measures went through almost unanimously, I am surprised—as is nearly every other Member of the Senate—to find the opposition which has been manifested during the present debate.

As I view the situation, this condition appears to be based largely on two objections. I am not now stating my own views but what has been said again and again on the floor of the Senate.

The first objection is that the proceedings preliminary to negotiating the agreements are believed to be somewhat secretive and of a star-chamber character; that there is an insufficient opportunity for aggrieved producers and their dependent employees to be heard before the agreements are consummated, or even to present and have judicially considered their complaints after the agreements become operative; and that the escape clause is ineffective.

Secondly, there is a growing conviction that Congress should have concurrent control, or some limited right of approval of the action of the executive agency of the Congress, to the end that injury may not be done unconsciously to any domestic producer.

The further extension of the act for 1 year will meet these objections in large part. It will be notice to the country that between now and a year from June the Congress hopes to work out some plan which will more effectively protect the rights of aggrieved producers and permit Congress to share some responsibility in negotiating and approving the agreements which will not be injurious or destructive to the general objective, namely, the expansion of our foreign trade and the creation of a better understanding between foreign nations and our country through more satisfactory trade relations.

Mr. President, I sincerely believe that we should vote today to extend for 1 year the authority to make the agreements, with the understanding that an effort will be made to remove the objections which have been developed in our own party and on our side of the Chamber. In my opinion, we can remove all objections between now and a year from now. I should regret very much, as would many of my colleagues on this side of the Chamber, to see the whole subject of tariff making with its logrolling methods brought back to Congress, or the agreements referred to Congress without restriction.

Mr. President, I do not seek to influence the votes of Senators. I have never asked a Member of the Senate to vote for any measure which I have introduced. I do not believe in going around whispering, "Vote with me; vote for my amendment." When I finish my services in this Chamber, I want to be able to say I have not whispered in the ear of a living human being a request to support any amendment advocated by me.

Mr. President, during my 20 years in public life I have tried to be impersonal. I have little respect for the public man who votes for or against any measure because of his like or dislike of a party leader, or the promoter of a bill, or political issue, or for one who may be temporarily occupying the Executive office. When I am through here, one of the things I wish to have said of me is that I have been impersonal. What I love to think and say of our beloved friend the late Senator BORAH, of Idaho, is that he was impersonal. I have never heard him say a mean or ill-tempered thing against a colleague. I have heard him attacked, his motives questioned and misjudged, and then have heard him reply by returning to the subject matter and paying no attention to the personal attack. What a glorious example. No one ever heard him whisper in the ear of any Senator, "You ought to vote this way or that way. Help me on this vote."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will have to suggest that the time of the Senator from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LEE obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think there will be any opposition to the request I desire to make, as I must leave the Senate Chamber to go to a committee meeting. I ask that the yeas and nays be ordered on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts requests the yeas and nays on his amendment. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I rise to oppose this amendment, which is an effort to destroy by degrees what cannot be done in its entirety at one stroke; an effort to undermine and destroy the reciprocal-trade program by cutting it down a little at a time.

In my opinion, the adoption of this amendment would show a lack of confidence in the program and in this administration.

The amendment does not provide for a limitation of agreements. Agreements may still be made for a 3-year period. Then why not have the program extend for the same period?

In our contracts for farm tenants we are doing our best to get a 3-year term, in order to afford a feeling of stability, in order that the farmer may make his plans accordingly. The same thing is true in the school-teaching field. We are trying to make longer contracts, because they make for stability, they make for peace of mind, and they make for better planning. That is just as true in the matter of making trade agreements.

Mr. President, I am convinced that our future lies in the direction of an extension of the trade of the United States. It may be that tariffs were a good thing at the beginning of our country; but at the beginning of this Nation it was argued, and with some logic, "We are a young nation. We must have tariffs to protect our young industries until they are able to compete with the industries of the old country." But the stronger the industrial group grew the higher went the tariffs. The higher the tariffs went the stronger the industrial group became; and the agricultural element of the country has been paying tribute to that policy for years. The industrial group, outnumbering the agricultural element in the Congress, has been able, through a policy of logrolling in making tariffs over a period of years, to make laws favorable to the industrial East, and unfavorable to the South and West, because they could outvote them.

Here is a program which does not rest upon the principle of "You scratch my back and I will scratch your back," and "The fellow that gets there the mostest and the firstest is the one that gets the most favorable law out of a tariff program." Here is a program which contemplates the general welfare, one which contemplates the good of the Nation as a whole, and looks to the future.

Why should we launch a great program for building a merchant marine—which has been only temporarily stopped on account of the war—and at the same time be willing only an inch at a time to grant life to a program of reciprocal trade?

I believe in trade. At one time in the history of the world trade was limited to the Mediterranean, and it built the city of Constantinople and other port cities. Then it gradually moved out into the Atlantic, built the city of London and then built the cities of New York, New Orleans, and San Francisco. We saw trade making the great marts of commerce in the world, and it is still true that trade will build great cities and great nations.

Before the world caught on fire with war we were establishing a good trade with the teeming millions of Mother India. They were just awakening to the desirability of our manufactured products. They were enjoying the results of our manufacturers' efforts in giving the world the most tasty foods, and the finest woven fabrics, and the best finished leather, and other products of industry; and they were sending in their oriental products, which we do not produce, to exchange for them. I think it is a short-sighted policy to say that we in America do not have enough courage and enough confidence in our own program of reciprocal trade to give more than 1 year's life to this extension.

It is argued, "Let us extend the act for 1 year, and at the end of the year we will see what we want." Why not turn the proposal around and extend the act for 3 years, the same length of time as the agreements that may be made under it? Then, in the meantime, if we want to change the act, the same power that gives it life today may kill it at any time it is deemed best, in the wisdom of Congress and the Executive of the Nation, to terminate it. Let us give it life; and then, if we find fault in it, we can take action in the same way. But it is a negative approach to say, "We will give the act an extension of life just 1 year at a time, and kill it gradually." When there is not enough voting power on the floor of the Senate to kill it all at once, it is sought to do by degrees what cannot be done at one fell stroke.

Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I should like to take 5 or 10 minutes to reason with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and the other Members of the Senate. Naturally, because of the political situation, I address myself mainly to the Democratic Members of the Senate. We are fairly sure that the Members on the other side are going to vote solidly for this amendment.

I know the Senator from Massachusetts has been a friend of the Hull program. I believe he stated, either directly or by inference, that he would not have offered this amendment if he were certain that the present Secretary of State were going to administer the program for the next 3 years. I, myself, feel that way. I am fully satisfied with the present law, and with its extension for 3 years, if Secretary Hull is going to administer the program. But I believe that the Senator from Massachusetts, entirely without intending to do so, would bring about such a situation that we would be practically certain to have every trade agreement now in existence canceled during the first 4 months of the next administration, if the fear he expressed should be realized, that is, the selection of a high-protectionist President.

The Senator's amendment would extend the trade-agreements program for 1 year; that is, until June 12, 1941. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] very accurately pointed out, in a colloquy with the chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. HARRISON], that if the extension should be made for 1 year, the agreements could continue on for an indefinite period, notwithstanding the expiration of the period during which new agreements could be made. But the Senator from Colorado did not point out the essential fact that not a rate could be changed after the 1-year period had expired; not an embargo could be made against any particular product. The trade-agreements program would become fixed, absolute, certain, and unchangeable in any manner whatever except by the entire obliteration of the agreements. The only thing the Executive could do after June 1, 1941, would be to discontinue the entire program.

What would be the attitude of an opposition administration, to which the Senator is mainly directing his amendment, if it should come into office? It would have merely the period from January 20, 1941, to June 12, 1941, within which to make up its mind whether or not it would proceed with this program. It could not wait a while and try out the situation. Action would be demanded because of the fleeting 4 months. What would be the result of that, if the opposition should happen to win the coming election? I do not think it is going to do so. I agree with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] that the result in Wisconsin is a clear indication that so far as the Midwest is concerned the Democrats are still on top. We polled more votes than the Republicans did by some thirty or forty thousand.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an observation in that respect?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I have just come into the Senate Chamber. I am thoroughly satisfied that the Senator thought he was stating a fact; but if he will compare the total vote cast in Wisconsin for the Democrats with the total vote cast for President Roosevelt in 1936, he will find that the President has lost about 300,000 votes in Wisconsin.

There is no question that every political observer in the Nation has stated that the size of the Democratic vote was due to the fact that at least from 100,000 to 150,000 Progressive votes went into the Democratic column because the Progressives had no delegates of their own.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator realizes, does he not, that I am speaking under a 15-minute time limitation?

Mr. WILEY. I yield the Senator 10 minutes of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That cannot be done.

Mr. BROWN. I do not think we need to go back as far as 1936 to compare the Democratic vote with the recent vote in Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. I cannot yield further to the Senator now.

Mr. WILEY. Will not the Senator compare the 1938 vote?

Mr. BROWN. I will go back to 1938, when the distinguished junior Senator from Wisconsin received something over 400,000 votes on the Republican ticket. The candidate on the Progressive ticket came second——

Mr. WILEY. With 249,209.

Mr. BROWN. And the candidate on the Democratic ticket was third——

Mr. WILEY. With 231,976; and I received 446,770.

Mr. BROWN. That was in 1938. In 1940 the Democrats go from third to first. I do not see how Senators on the other side can get any comfort out of that situation. But I do not wish to be diverted from the thread of my argument. I am saying to the senior Senator from Massachusetts that his amendment would be as certain to kill the entire reciprocal-trade program as anything could be, because if the Republicans, assuming the situation which the Senator has assumed, and against which his amendment is directed, should be placed in power they would have but 4 months in which to operate. What would they do? No matter how complicated may be the platforms, they would say, if they should win, that they had received a mandate to kill the reciprocal-trade program. They would not have time to negotiate any new program; therefore they would do just one thing, they would use the power of termination which is granted in the act, and, in my judgment, terminate every one of the 20 agreements we have at the present time, because they would not have time to do anything else.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. If the issue now before us is an issue in the next election, and we are unable to give any satisfactory answer to the criticisms made, a Republican President would feel that he had a mandate to cancel the agreements. I am trying to prevent that. I am trying to secure two modifications: First, to provide that Congress shall have the right to approve or disapprove of reciprocal agreements made by the Executive, and, secondly, to give greater opportunity to interested parties to be heard before agreements are entered into.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. BROWN. I desire first to answer the Senator from Massachusetts. When the Republicans were in power in 1930 and 1932 they passed the Smoot-Hawley Act. They did not leave with us an act which we could change by mere executive action. Before we could change the Smoot-Hawley Act we had to have agreement of the House of Representatives, of the Senate, and of the President. All three had to join. Why should we not do the same thing in the present year, and leave a statute, if we are to go out of power, that is a democratic statute? I do not think we are going out of power, I do not like to talk along this line, but I am forced to do so because of the position of the Senator from Massachusetts.

We want to keep the reciprocal-trade program on the books. We do not want to say we will merely extend the law until the next election. We want stability in our tariff rates. Stability in tariff rates, in my judgment, as I have stated on two occasions on this floor, is more important than absolute justice. Industry wants to know whether this program is to stop or to continue. To me that is the most vital thing in this fight. It is the one thing which causes me to go along with the administration when, as I have stated, I have some misgivings in this matter of delegation of congressional authority. But I have been firmly convinced that if we change the program now, if we indicate weakness, if we indicate that we have no confidence in the Secretary of State, in effect we are saying to the business world, saying to agriculture, "We are not certain about this thing. There may be a change in November 1940. There may be a new Secretary of State in 1941, and perhaps a new program." I want a situation of stability and certainty, which I think is the most vital thing in tariff making.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. There is an advantage in these agreements in the matter of stability. But the small man, in fact, the correspondent from whom I read, learns that his factory is closed because of low-tariff duties, and he is in bankruptcy. There is stability. He knows where he ends. The man who gets unsatisfactory rates by an agreement knows the door is locked. Is the Senator ready to go before the country and say, "This is perfection; this program should not be amended; there should be no additional right to be heard granted those who think they are aggrieved, and Congress should not interfere with the acceptance of the agreements"? In my opinion, the sufferers under this program, if there are sufferers, are the small dealers, the small merchants, the small-business men.

I am asking for the adoption of the amendment in order that we may try within the next year to work out something satisfactory.

Mr. BROWN. I do not think the legislation we have passed is perfect by any means. I think legislation is always a matter of adjustment. We cannot please everyone. But I believe this program has pleased more of the American people than any tariff legislation we have enacted during the past 40 years.

I say in conclusion, Mr. President, that I want a tariff program which has reasonable stability to it. I would rather vote for an amendment which would add a year or 2 years, rather than to subtract or take a year from the period of authority which we grant to the President. I want reasonable certainty in the rates that govern our foreign trade.

Mr. President, I hope that those who have stood by this program—and I, like many others, am not in complete agreement with it, but think it is the best thing we can do in the present world emergency—I sincerely hope that those who have stood so solidly during the 2 weeks of the debate will continue to stand together, and pass the joint resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator feel that, in view of the chaotic condition of the world, the uncertainty of the world war, the demands which will be made upon the financial integrity of this as well as other countries, it would be rather unwise for us to plan a course which would bind us, even for 1 year, with respect to our exports and our imports?

Mr. BROWN. Let me answer the Senator by saying that if world conditions were normal, I would be one of the first to demand that this matter be turned back to the Congress, at least for some form of congressional approval in the making of tariff rates. But I have been convinced that the great necessity is for action on the part of the Secretary of State when a dangerous situation arises, and I do not think that kind of action can be taken with the promptness necessary unless we extend the powers which are granted in the act.

Such a proposal would inject serious instability into our entire trade policy. For 6 years we have now had a clear-cut foreign-trade policy. To amend this bill now, to restrict its extension to 1 year, would mean that during this year American business, industry, agriculture, and shipping would be completely up in the air as to what was to be the future policy of this Government.

The question of the welfare of agriculture, as connected with foreign markets, is not a 1-year problem. The ability of our industries to maintain their trade relations is not a 1-year problem. The matter of employment in our port cities, of our ships and sailors, is not a 1-year matter. It is absurd to attempt to make the shaping of our economic relations with the rest of the world a 1-year matter.

The adoption of the amendment would be interpreted at home and abroad as the first step toward an abandonment in this country of principles which the trade-agreements program has represented. Millions of people have supported the extension of the program as a reaffirmation by this country of those basic principles for which we are prepared to stand when peace and reconstruction are possible. A 1-year limitation now would indicate irresolution on the part of this country with respect to its future policy. Such irresolution would impair our efforts to protect our trade during the war period itself since other nations would rapidly abandon liberal trade policies in order not to be left holding the bag. Likewise such irresolution on our part would greatly encourage those forces which, unless resisted at this time, will result in another calamitous peace.

It is necessary to have this program to protect our domestic prosperity during the war period and the reconstruction period. No one knows what may be the duration of these periods, but certainly they are not likely to be limited to 1 year.

It would not be feasible to carry on the program if it were limited to a year's duration, since preliminary preparation, investigation, and negotiations may require considerably longer time and other nations would not be prepared to enter upon preliminary discussions or negotiations if the authority of this Government to conclude an agreement was limited to a 12-month period. In short, it would make the program utterly unworkable during the 12 months' extension.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay a vote, but I have one or two ideas on the pending amendment which I desire to submit to the Senate.

Frankly, I regret that, after we have proceeded for nearly 2 weeks considering the pending joint resolution, and the Senate has consistently refused to complicate the situation by adopting amendments which have been offered, we find ourselves at the last moment confronted with an amendment the effect of which, without the Senator from Massachusetts so intending, I am sure, would be to—I do not like the word "scuttle"—but the effect is the same. It is my belief that if we should limit the operation of the law to 1 year in all probability no more trade agreements would be entered into within that period. Certainly it would be more difficult to enter into them, because frequently it takes nearly a year of negotiation on both sides to arrive at an agreement, and in all probability it would be more difficult, due to the chaotic condition of the world, to come to an agreement now than it has been in the past 6 years, since the original enactment of the law. So I honestly believe that limiting the operation of the law to 1 year would mean that no more agreements would be entered into.

I do not entertain the fears which have been expressed with respect to the coming election, but let us assume for the sake of the argument, and only for the sake of the argument, that a Republican President should be elected; let us assume that he might desire, as has been expressed here, to raise tariff rates instead of lowering any of them; let us assume that he approached another nation in order to negotiate a trade agreement, and that nation should say, "All right, Mr. President of the United States; what have you to offer as an inducement? What concessions will you make to us in order to bring about an adjustment of our trade relations?" If the President desired to increase these rates, can Senators imagine him saying, "Well, these are my terms. If you will lower the barriers that keep my goods out of your country, I will raise the barriers, and we will continue to keep your goods out of my country." That is what it amounts to. How many nations in the world would be so stupid as to enter into an agreement of that sort? So I have no fear that whoever may be elected President of the United States, whether he is a Democrat or a Republican, will be able in trying to negotiate an agreement to induce any other nation to make all the concessions in our behalf, while we are insisting upon making it more difficult for them to get their goods into our country.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. In that connection I should like to make the point that if the Walsh amendment should be adopted, the right to negotiate would expire on June 12, 1941.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct.

Mr. BROWN. If the unfortunate condition to which the Senator refers—the defeat of the Democrats—should take place, which the Senator from Kentucky and I are confident, and I am sure the Senator from Massachusetts is confident, will not take place, then there would not be time for a Secretary of State to look into the matter of the trade agreements, to stop and consider and determine whether or not changes could be made that would be reasonably satisfactory to everyone. The only thing they would have time to do would be to cancel the agreements, and very likely that is what they would do. It seems to me that is the real danger in the Walsh amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I did refer to the fact that there might be a Republican President elected, and that there might be a different Secretary of State, and the Senator knows some Democrats who might occupy that position, who have a different tariff philosophy than that under which the program has been carried out by Secretary Hull.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if we should limit the operation of this law to 1 year, then no matter who may be elected President, within 4 months we would have another tariff fight in the Congress of the United States. If a Republican should be elected, he could bring on a tariff fight anyway, if he wanted to, but if a Democrat should be elected he should not be compelled to bring one on when we are here and now undertaking to provide a way by which it can be avoided.

Mr. President, I have gone through tariff fights. As I said the other day, I was here when Congress passed the present law, and that law dragged its tortuous course through the House of Representatives, beginning in 1929, for a period of 19 months. It wound up by being signed by the President in June 1930. We were 19 months writing that tariff law.

It would be more difficult now to write one under the present world conditions than it was then. We who were here then can recall that there was so much logrolling and back scratching that you could almost see the blood flow. [Laughter.]

I do not believe that in the present world condition we ought to undertake to enter into a long-drawn-out tariff fight on the floor of the Senate and in the House, and I think these 3-year agreements will be a very wholesome lever in the adjustment of the post-war conditions in the trade relations of the country.

Suppose we say that the law shall not be continued for more than 1 year; suppose that 1 day before the European war ends the law expires, and all these treaties and the authority to make them expire. We know that following the war millions of men in the trenches will insist that they be provided with employment in private industry. Every nation will start out to become self-sufficient, as it did after the last war. Every nation will begin again to raise even higher the barriers against trade, on the ground that it can compel its people to consume its own products, as was done by Italy after the last war. Then Italy refused any longer to buy American tobacco, because the Italian Government sought to induce the Italian people to chew and smoke the tobacco they produced. That same impulse toward extreme nationalism and self-sufficiency will continue when the European war comes to an end; and, if there is no binding tie between our Nation and other nations, the world will again witness the scramble for the erection of higher and higher barriers against international trade. If the agreements which are entered into, extending for a period of 3 years, continue 1 or 2 years beyond the end of hostilities, they will have a binding effect, they will have a wholesome effect, upon international trade, and, in my judgment, will be very potent in making it possible to adjust the existing international difficulties.

If the pending amendment is agreed to, we limit the power of the President to 1 year, every nation which has a treaty with us now, and every nation that is even considering entering into negotiations, will consider our action as a lack of confidence in the Government of the United States, and they will say, "Why should we enter into any negotiations? Why should we enter into any arrangements with a government whose Congress is willing to risk entering into an agreement for only 12 months?"

I do not think that ought to happen. I think it would be disastrous. It would be misinterpreted all over the world.

For these reasons and others which I do not wish to take the time to discuss, I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. HOLT. Is it not a fact that most countries with which we have trade agreements require legislative ratification by their own legislatures?

Mr. BARKLEY. I consulted the Secretary of State about that matter because it had been brought up in the debate, and I was told that the entire 22 agreements, with two exceptions, became effective at once, and that the subsequent ratification was a mere matter of form; and in the case of some of them, such as those with Canada and Great Britain, where, as we know, the parliamentary system of government prevails, and the government itself is a part of the parliament, the agreements went into effect immediately upon being signed by the respective countries.

Mr. HOLT. But it is a fact, is it not, that all but two of those agreements had to be ratified by the legislature of the participating country?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not in order to take effect; no. They were subsequently ratified, but that was a matter of form. There was no delay. All went into effect immediately upon being signed, except the two I referred to.

Mr. HOLT. But finally they were all ratified?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course. If they had been rejected, they would not have qualified. But they went into effect upon signature, and have been in effect ever since, so that the ratification provided for in those countries was a mere formality, and was brought about after the treaties went into effect.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have not looked up any particular agreement that has been entered into to see how much time elapsed between the time it was first negotiated and the completion of the agreement. But it is my contention that, if we limit to 1 year the power to make the agreement, we shall for practical purposes have made it impossible to get any agreement unless it is made in a hurried manner, something which has been condemned during 2 weeks of oratory here, particularly on the Republican side of the Chamber. Many amendments have been offered providing that we must have action by the Senate, action by the House, a two-thirds vote by the Senate, and favorable action by both Houses. Any such restrictions would result in delay.

After initiating an agreement I have no doubt that on the average more than a year will have passed before the agreement is completed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am advised by the Tariff Commission that the average time is a year, two months, and some days. The most important treaty, however, involving more than 500 items, was completed in 9 months. That was the one with the United Kingdom, and that was considered an exhibition of remarkable expedition. But the average time is a year and two months and some days.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator for that contribution. It demonstrates what I think every Senator, from his own experience and observation, must realize to be true. Do we want to hurry those who are negotiating trade agreements? If we are to have an agreement, do we want to say to our Government, "Do your work now, and do it in a hurry. Do not investigate the situation. Do not look into the matter"?

Mr. President, that is something which we have denounced repeatedly.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I think perhaps the Senator would be pleased to know that Secretary Hull stated before the Finance Committee that they were not negotiating any treaties at the present time. That the principal and the very important service that they are rendering is to be in a position to enforce the escape clauses in the agreements. I personally think, if I may add a word further, that that provision is a very vital one and a very important one, and that is why I am personally opposed to the agreements program being abrogated in toto.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator for his contribution, but I hope Senators will realize that my time is limited and not take up too much of it. There are several things I have to say.

That is one of the reasons, Mr. President, which caused me to believe that the amendment should be defeated. We ought to be prepared to meet conditions which will arise when the world war is over. Unless we continue the trade agreements, we may find ourselves unprepared to meet a situation such as even our imagination cannot portray to us at the present time.

We ought to have some instrumentality. If we limit our Secretary of State to the exercise of this authority for 1 year, for practical purposes we shall perhaps make it impossible for him to meet the situation, or even to attempt to meet it.

Much has been said by various Senators about the politics involved in this matter. It has been said that we may have a Republican President. Perhaps we shall. So far as I am concerned, I should like to give him the same instrumentality, no matter who he is or to what political party he gives adherence. Give him an opportunity to do some good. Whether or not he does, it is up to him, not us; but if we take away the authority, the blame can be put upon our shoulders.

Mr. President, reciprocity is a Republican doctrine. James G. Blaine, the plumed knight of Maine, was the father of reciprocity. When I was a boy too young to vote, I worshiped at his shrine. I was delighted when he succeeded. I was filled with despair when he met defeat. Now the Republican Party, so far as the Senate is concerned, is apparently turning its back on that policy. We may have a Republican President who will be in favor of reciprocity, as the country would have had if James G. Blaine had been made President. If he had been given that opportunity no Republican would have blushed at his success or his ability. Perhaps some Republican will come forward and be elected President who can take the place of James G. Blaine, the father of reciprocity, and advocate the same theories which he so ably advocated.

Mr. President, I am despondent to see the two Senators from Maine both supporting the Republican Party in its unanimity in this Chamber against the pending measure. For weeks, together with certain Senators on the Democratic side who are likewise opposed to the joint resolution, they have resorted to all kinds of amendments, many of which, if they had been adopted, would have killed reciprocity.

I do not blame Senators for such tactics, if they are opposed to the entire program. They are a legitimate legislative method of fighting. However, one after another, the Senate has knocked down those amendments. This is one more. Regardless of the patriotic belief of the Senator who offered it—and I do not question his motives—the effect will be to take the teeth out of the law, and to kill it. In effect, it is another chiseling of the law.

I do not complain of any Senator's vote for the amendment. If he is opposed to any reciprocity that is a legitimate and proper thing to do. However, there are prominent, influential, powerful, and patriotic Republicans scattered over this Nation who believe in reciprocity today, just as Republicans believed in it in the days of James G. Blaine.

So far as the Senate Republicans are concerned, they are about to bury reciprocity. They are about to turn their backs on one of the greatest leaders the Republican Party ever had in its history. I have thought, Mr. President, that we ought to have some kind of a public ceremony over the death of reciprocity in the Republican Party. I should like to have one Senator from Maine preside as chairman at the obsequies, and I should like to have the other Senator from Maine deliver the funeral oration. Reciprocity is a Republican doctrine. In my judgment, Republican Senators, in this instance, are moved by a partisanship which, if carried to extremes, is always injurious to the welfare of our country and our people.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator mentioned Mr. Blaine as one of the great Republican advocates of reciprocity. I should like to ask him if a more recent advocate was not the great President, Mr. Taft, whose son is now a Member of this body?

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is true. As we all know, there is a unanimity among Senate Republicans in the votes on the chiseling amendments which have been introduced in the past week, entirely to kill reciprocity. Among the Republicans there has been a unanimous vote in favor of doing so. I cannot think they believe in that course. Perhaps they consider it a good political method of trying to control the next Presidential election. I do not believe it is even decent, good politics. It will not work. The people of the country will look with sorrow on the spectacle of representatives of a great political party, which, in many respects, has had a noble history in the past, now chiseling, cutting down, and destroying the keystone which was brought forth by one of the greatest leaders in the history of the Republican Party.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was about to suggest that following the advocacy of this policy by Mr. Blaine, the Senator will recall that in his last speech, at Buffalo, President McKinley advocated the same policy. Later, Theodore Roosevelt and William Howard Taft—particularly in respect to the Canadian treaty—advocated the same form of reciprocity.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. So in the Republican Party there is a long line of outstanding advocates of reciprocity.

Mr. NORRIS. As I remember, one of the last speeches made by William McKinley was in favor of reciprocity. Soon afterward he was felled by the assassin's bullet and went to his last resting place, almost with the words of reciprocity on his lips.

We now find the Republican Party, at least in the Senate, unanimous in trying to kill that policy of government by methods which are indirect. Every Republican Senator will vote for this amendment. Why? For the same reason that they all voted for the other amendments, the effect of which would have been to kill or injure reciprocity. Again they will be unanimous; and I wonder how the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] can obtain much consolation from the fact that he is backed principally by Members who are bitterly opposed to his party and the principles which its representatives advocate.

Mr. President, I am not influenced by such considerations. I should like to extend the power to make agreements because it remedies a condition which is indescribable. It does not entirely cure it. However, every Member of this body knows the agony and the dissatisfaction which always follow the enactment of a tariff bill, no matter what party is in power. We all know that a tariff bill becomes a logrolling plan before it is passed. I do not find fault with that situation, because it is so from the very necessity of the case. The making of reciprocal-trade agreements is to some extent a remedy for the terrible and disastrous condition which never yet has led to the enactment of a single satisfactory, efficient, or logical tariff bill.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have listened with much interest to the distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. Far be it from me to challenge any of his remarks. However, when he speaks about the Republican Party—the party of which he was once such a distinguished member—and about the Republican group in the Senate in the way that he does, I feel that it is up to me, one of the neophytes in the party, to rise and speak my sentiments not only on the amendment now before the Senate but in reply to his rather derogatory remarks about my brethren.

When he referred to the former Senator from Maine, Senator Blaine, and asked in a rather ironical way why the Members representing that great State in this body had gone back on the doctrines of that distinguished Senator, I would answer by saying they have not gone back on those doctrines. I would answer that most of the amendments the Senator from Nebraska so criticizes have been offered by Senators on the other side of the aisle. The Democrats of this body have come over—those who have offered the amendments—to the Republican side. By that I mean the Republican side of Senator Blaine. We have always stood for maintaining the integrity of the Senate with no sell-out to the President.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WILEY. I will yield, but not for long. I want my 15 minutes to reply to the challenging argument the Senator from Nebraska has already made.

Mr. NORRIS. I am wondering if the Democrats have come over to the Republicans or whether the Republicans have not gone over en masse to a few Democrats.

Mr. WILEY. I would answer that by saying, my dear Senator, we have not followed in your footsteps. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, the reciprocity of Blaine, the reciprocity of McKinley, the reciprocity of Taft is still the doctrine of the Republican Party, and we welcome those distinguished Democrats who have seen the light and who have joined with us in advocacy of that highly desirable Republican reciprocity. Let it be made plain what that is. That reciprocity means fair dealings between nations on a fair basis. It means further no surrender by the Senate or the Congress of the United States in negotiating any reciprocity agreement, of any of the constitutional powers which are lodged in the Senate or in the Congress. Thus far, I think, we have established, by the votes of the Republican Members of this body, that we are unwilling to surrender our constitutional rights as Senators.

When the distinguished Senator from Massachussetts [Mr. WALSH] says, by his amendment, let us delegate to the President for 1 year, commencing with June of the present year, the right as the agent of the Congress, or of the Senate, to negotiate reciprocity agreements, some of us say we will make the President the agent of Congress for 1 year longer. Why should it be longer than 1 year? The distinguished Senator from Nebraska refers to conditions over there and what is liable to happen after the close of the war. But he fails to particularize. Then he argues therefrom that we must turn over to the Executive our legislative power to deal for us—the representatives of the people of this country. But does the Senate need anyone to deal for it? No; the Senate does not need anyone to deal for it. I have confidence in the Members of this body—their judgment, their patriotism.

Furthermore, I wish to call attention to a challenging fact which seems to have been overlooked. Twenty-two agreements are now in effect; and, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, no further agreements are in the making. Why? The answer is found in the statement of the Senator from Nebraska that, because of conditions over there, because of the depreciation of currencies, because of a thousand details that have come into the picture since the President negotiated the last reciprocity treaty for us we cannot enter into further agreements.

Bear in mind that if by June 20—I think that is the date when the 3-year limit will expire—if by that time no further power is conferred upon the President of the United States to negotiate, the existing trade treaties will not go into the discard; those treaties will continue ad infinitum; they will continue on unless—what? Unless action is taken by the appropriate body to cancel them. If the treaties are working well, and are good, they will continue. If they are not working well, then, under the terms of the compacts or agreements, cancelation can be made. And, further, under the Constitution the President can negotiate treaties but the Senate must pass on them.

Now, Mr. President, let us revert to our discussion on the principles of the Republican Party. I say, and I say it without any equivocation, that the Republican Party has not gone back on reciprocity, but that the Democratic Party has asked that the Senate of the United States take no further part in reciprocity; and indeed has asked the Senate to give away its rights, shirk its duty.

Senator Blaine felt that the Senate should become a party to every reciprocity agreement. So did McKinley and so did Taft. This kind of reciprocity is the reciprocity of the Republican Party today.

Another suggestion made by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska was that if we merely give the President 1 year in which to operate—I think he called it a "chiseling" amendment—the effect of that 1-year limitation will be to "chisel" out of existence the doctrine of reciprocity. Several days ago I made some remarks on the floor of the Senate in which, in substance, I said, among other things, that I would prophesy that after the present war in Europe was over there would not be any thought or talk of trying to initiate reciprocity arrangements, agreements, treaties, or compacts. Why? As has been demonstrated on the floor of the Senate, in 2 years we will have practically all the gold in the world. Then other countries will not be able to buy from us. Reciprocity implies that the other fellow has something to trade for something we desire to sell. Secondly, their currencies will become so depreciated that they will have to resort to the same practices which Germany has initiated in her dealings with South America. Then many who are now in the Senate and who for 7 years have, in the vernacular of the street, "lambasted" the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, will sing praises to high heaven that there is available some kind of a legislative barrier to prevent America being inundated by a flood of European goods.

I also said the other day that then Europe will need America more than ever, and she will need an America that is self-sustaining—an America that will not be paralyzed by a flood of cheap peon-labor-made goods. As the result, she will need, as I said, a great humanitarian like Hoover who will reach out and give of his heart and soul and of the finances voluntarily contributed by American citizens to take care of poor bleeding citizens of Europe.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. In a moment I will yield.

Furthermore, Europe will need the sympathetic heartthrobs of the world, but she will need, above everything else, a great nation that is standing on her own feet and able to accomplish things, and will not be able to accomplish much if we let "sob stuff" interfere with the rights and property of our 130,000,000 people. The Republican Party has always stood for the American doctrine of markets for American products from American farms and American factories.

Let the barriers down and instead of 10,000,000 unemployed, as we have now, we will have 30,000,000 unemployed. Let the barriers down and factories will be closed. Let the barriers down and America will face revolution. Keep the barriers up; make ourselves more and more self-sufficient to meet emergencies; then we can reach into Europe and do a worth-while job. Now I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. May I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin—and I think it is appropriate to what he was saying—to an excerpt from a speech by William McKinley in 1897?

Mr. WILEY. Do not read the entire speech.

Mr. LODGE. The excerpt is very brief and is as follows:

> The end in view is always to be the opening up of new markets for the products of our country by granting concessions to products of other lands that we need and cannot produce ourselves and which do not involve any loss of labor to our own people, but tend rather to increase their employment.

Mr. WILEY. I thank the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. His statement reminded me of Lincoln's story when he spoke of "the end in view," but, of course, that story does not necessarily apply to this argument.

Mr. President, I was speaking in relation to conditions America would face at the conclusion of the world war. When that time comes America must be ready. One year from today no one knows what the conditions will be. Mr. President, I find a great deal of humor in "the wishful wishing" of my brethren on the other side who get up and say, "Well, you know, if a Republican President is elected, or if this condition happens, and so forth." Well, I am afraid that the fear of God is in their systems. They know the job that was promised to be done as outlined in their 1932 platform has not been done. They know the American people are going to speak without any equivocation, without any doubt, and that new leadership is coming to America.

That, however, is not on this point. The point is that a year from now the President and the Congress will have had 1 more year of experience, 1 more year of perspective, seeing the whole world as a picture, knowing what should be done. Yes; a year from now this body will be just as well able to determine and, in fact, better able to determine what should be done than at present. The Senate in this changing world should hesitate to vacate its place for the Executive.

I feel deeply in accord with the sentiments of the distinguished Democrats who have said that we Senators owe an obligation to maintain and retain the functions of government which are conferred upon the Senate by the Constitution; and I personally feel that if we now delegate that power for a period of 3 years we shall be remiss to our constitutional obligation and our obligation as citizens of this great Republic.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. LEE. Does the Senator favor this amendment?

Mr. WILEY. Yes.

Mr. LEE. Is the Senator against the extension of the Trade Agreements Act in its entirety?

Mr. WILEY. I am against giving unrestricted power to the President; yes.

Mr. LEE. The Senator is against the extension and will vote "no" on the extension of the act. Is that true?

Mr. WILEY. That depends upon the subsequent amendments to the joint resolution. I do not know how the joint resolution will read at the time of the final vote upon it. I have my idea as to how it will read.

Mr. LEE. Would the Senator vote for the joint resolution if this amendment were added to it?

Mr. WILEY. If this amendment and other constructive amendments and safeguards were added, I should give that matter serious consideration.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, on the 17th of April 1939, our distinguished majority leader, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], introduced into the RECORD a letter from the President of the United States to the Chancelor of the German Reich. On page 1483 of volume 84, part 12 of the RECORD, we find this sentence—the President had been talking about the matter of a discussion looking toward disarmament—he then said:

> Simultaneously the Government of the United States would be prepared to take part in discussions looking toward the most practical manner of opening up avenues of international trade to the end that every nation of the earth may be enabled to buy and sell on equal terms in the world market as well as to possess assurance of obtaining the materials and products of peaceful economic life.

Mr. President, that particular sentence and that statement of the objective then in the President's mind underlie this entire program. There can be no doubt about that. Anyone who is opposed to a continuation of the reciprocal trade-agreements program should vote against the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. Why should we continue for 1 more year beyond June 12, 1940, the unrestricted power to make agreements with any other number of nations beyond those with which we have already agreed?

Mr. President, quite the contrary. The situation, as it seems to me, is in this light, and should be understood, for there has been a great deal of loose talk here this afternoon about limiting the President's power to 1 year. It has been said over and over and over again by one Senator or another, in effect, that there is under discussion the power of the President to enter into new agreements which would be good for only 1 year. Not a bit of it. Let us look at the law for a moment.

In section 2, subparagraph (b), we find a clause the provisions of which are written into every single outstanding agreement of the 22 now in force:

> Every foreign trade agreement concluded pursuant to this act shall be subject to termination, upon due notice to the foreign government concerned, at the end of not more than 3 years from the date on which the agreement comes into force, and, if not then terminated, shall be subject to termination thereafter upon not more than 6 months' notice.

So, Mr. President, all the agreements now in force will continue in force from June 1940 until at least January 1941, that being the earliest terminable date within the meaning of the law.

Congress will be back here in January. If we really want to keep our hands on the situation by voting down this entire program and by voting down the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts we shall not for one minute terminate outstanding agreements; but we shall at all times between now and then have an opportunity to examine into world conditions and to ascertain upon what basis, if any, we shall be willing to make new trade agreements.

Mr. President, if the program is an advantageous one, we ought to be for it. If it is not an advantageous one, we ought to be against it. Certainly there is not a Member of this body who is willing to vote for a disadvantageous agreement so far as the interests of the United States are concerned. With that thought in mind, how can we say that by allowing the present act to terminate the United States will lose even one iota of its position of power and prominence in the world, holding as it does the key to the monetary situation upon which all exchange must be predicated, holding as it does the power of the productivity of our vast factories, our farms, our resources? If there be any logical answer to that particular form of question it lies in the fact that the Department of State, carrying out the program of the President, undertakes to open up our markets to the countries of the world on equal terms. If that is what the people of the United States want, let them understand that it is being given to them by a majority which is committed to that type of program. Let them then ask, as Americans walk the streets looking for work, "Who did this to us?"

Mr. President, the United States is not greatly unlike a figure in a hypothetical case I shall present. Let us consider, if you will, that the United States is Uncle Sam, and that Uncle Sam is a garage man; that he is a repair station proprietor. Let us assume, if you will, that he does not like the presence of broken glass on the road, and he conceives that it is a service to the public in general if he gathers up that broken glass. Accordingly, he undertakes to pay $35 a bushel, if you choose, for all the broken glass that is brought to him. Every boy in the neighborhood and every boy in town goes out and gets all the broken glass he can. They gather it up, and they bring it to the garageman, Uncle Sam, and they put it in his bin; and at the end of a year he has an enormous hoard. If you choose, he has 18,000,000,000 bushels of broken glass in his bin.

Then the boys who got $35 for each bushel of broken glass go over to the candy store and the ice-cream store, and, of course, business booms. Of course, you can measure dollar for dollar, from 1934 down to date, the increase in exports allegedly due to a reciprocal-trade program over and coincident with the period during which we were acquiring 18,000,000,000 ounces of gold to be buried in a hole at Fort Knox, Ky.; not that it is not safe in Kentucky. Even though the distinguished former Governor of Kentucky has joined us, it is still safe at Fort Knox.

Mr. President, I have the greatest respect for my dear friend who occupies the chair at this moment (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair); but I say to him that if Uncle Sam, the custodian of that glass bin, that gold bin, has taken from the pockets of the American taxpayers $15 for every ounce of gold he has acquired, and has given it to foreigners every time he buys an ounce of gold worth only $20.67, is it not perfectly apparent that we have financed every dollar of the export business which has been developed? And that is not all, Mr. President. We paid an export bounty of 30 cents a bushel on 300,000 bushels of wheat exported to Japan only last month; we pay export bounties on cotton; and yet we hear talk about a reciprocal trade agreements program developing an export market for the United States. During the same period we have reduced the tariffs on more than a thousand articles which have been produced by Americans in times past, but are now being displaced by products imported from foreign countries.

Now, let us come back to our Uncle Sam, the garage man. Let us assume, if you will, that along comes a man driving an automobile which collides with a telegraph pole, and the automobile is wrecked. It is towed into Uncle Sam's garage, and he pays his laborers to put new parts into the car. He pays the automobile manufacturer for the parts he installs. He pays for a paint job; and then, at the end of the work, the owner of the car says, "I am sorry, Uncle Sam, but I cannot pay you right now for the work you have done on my car. If you will let me take the car for a while, I will bring you the money." He takes the car, and in a little while he comes back and says, "I cannot pay you in money, but I can pay you in goods. I have managed to get together 300 automobile tires to pay you for that job, and here they are."

Uncle Sam takes the tires, and when the tire salesman from Akron comes around Uncle Sam says to the tire salesman, "I am sorry; I do not need any tires. I have tires." The tire salesman tells his wholesaler, and the wholesaler says to the manufacturer, "I am sorry, we do not need any tires, because Uncle Sam is all stocked up with tires." So the factory closes, the people walk the streets looking for work, and they wonder why. Uncle Sam, who has financed the entire program from start to finish, has put his money into that automobile, has financed all the parts that went into it and all the labor that went into it, and finds himself in identically the situation the United States occupies today under this kind of program. We are financing every dollar's worth of this business.

Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts does not by any means reach to the heart of the situation. If you want the program, if you wish to give your President the power unrestrictedly to negotiate new agreements during the next year, which new agreements will have the force of an initial period of 3 years, and be in force indefinitely thereafter, then you can vote for the Walsh amendment. If, on the other hand, you are opposed to the principle, to the idea, to the basic philosophy, which would turn American markets over to the whole world, as the President said, "Open up the avenues of international trade so that all the people can have access to our markets," then vote for the Walsh amendment, vote to allow the program to continue 1 more year, and then vote, to be consistent, to continue the whole program 3 years. But do not under any circumstances vote for the amendment on the theory that you are voting to hamstring the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

So Mr. WALSH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, there are a great many different phases of the problem of reciprocal-trade agreement which should have extended study and full discussion and debate before final action is taken. I want to mention some of these, and then pass on to a more detailed discussion of two or three of the points which most directly affect the welfare of the people of North Dakota, and, of course, indirectly affect the welfare of the people of the whole Nation.

First. From the study I have made and from the arguments for and against the joint resolution, I have come to the conclusion that reciprocal-trade agreements are no more or less than special commercial treaties under another name. As such, they are treaties, and under the Constitution do not become legal or binding unless or until they have been submitted to the Senate and have received the approval of two-thirds of this body.

Second. The price changes in connection with commodities bought and sold in foreign trade should be given the same consideration as are the rates of duty. There is no question in my mind that concessions granted by us in the form of tariff reductions should automatically be canceled when price changes—due to whatever cause—result in definite injury to American agriculture, industry, and labor.

So far as agriculture is concerned, a clear-cut definition of injury would be when the domestic selling price of a commodity is below parity. The Congress has defined parity as the ratio of prices of farm products to prices paid by farmers for commodities purchased, using the 5-year pre-war period as the base in the setting up of a parity index.

Let me give one illustration:

The price of oats was only 24.4 cents per bushel in December 1938, and yet the tariff was reduced in the Canadian agreement from 16 cents per bushel to 8 cents per bushel. The lower rate became effective January 1, 1939. In December 1939 parity for oats was 51.1 cents per bushel.

While the price was slightly higher than in December 1938, because of relatively poor crops during 1939 the price in December was only 34.7 cents per bushel. In other words, oats were more than 16 cents per bushel below parity in price, yet the tariff was reduced 8 cents per bushel, and as a result over 4,000,000 bushels of oats were imported into the United States, thus helping to hold down our market prices.

In the first place, under those conditions, there was no excuse for reducing the duty on oats, and if it was technically reduced, the lower rate should not have been effective while domestic prices were below parity.

It is argued by some theorists that a crop which is sometimes on an export basis does not need a tariff, or that the tariff is ineffective. Actual experience shows that such tariffs are of vital importance because of the effect which they have upon the price structure. When the crop is short, the farmer should have a correspondingly higher price per bushel, but it is impossible to secure this if the tariff is removed and great quantities of imports are permitted at low rates or without duty.

Third. Just as price changes in the international market are more devastating than changes in rates of duty, so, too, fluctuating values of currency used in international settlements are more devastating than changes in tariffs. During the last few years currency values have been changed by all of the leading countries so much and so often that the ratio of the dollar to various foreign currencies changes almost from day to day. It would seem that this country should have taken adequate steps to protect the farmers and wage earners of the United States against the evil effect of these fluctuations in currency values.

During the last 6 months the depreciation in the case of the British pound, the French franc, the Canadian dollar, and other currencies has been a tremendous disadvantage to us, stimulating imports of many farm products while making it correspondingly difficult for us to export our products because of the reduced value of foreign money.

If the Trade Agreements Act is to be extended there should be provision calling for automatic cancelation of the agreement where foreign currency depreciation is disadvantageous to our people.

According to some of the articles written about the results of these trade agreements, it would seem that many of the foreign countries have outmaneuvered us. It really seems that they are better horse traders than we are.

We in this country seem to have entirely lost sight of what is going on abroad, or else we are too dumb to protect our own interests. The extension of the reciprocal trade agreements program merely continues the opportunity for tariff manipulations in the hands of a bureaucracy almost 100 percent made up of believers in the theory of free trade and who seem to be determined to bring about a complete downward tariff revision without any opportunity by Congress to review their action.

In the first trade agreement with Cuba, the principal purpose was to restore sugar prices in Cuba in order to restore peace in that small neighbor island republic. It is acknowledged by all that chaotic conditions existed. After the World War, when European countries returned to the production of sugar to supply their own needs, the world market for Cuban sugar fell out from under them and the Cuban sugar was literally dumped into the markets of the United States.

It is my understanding that the price of raw sugar in Cuba fell as low as one-half a cent per pound. Undoubtedly there was need for a modification of the commercial treaty between the United States and Cuba, and all of our people favored working out some method of stabilization. But there are many who protest that Cuba was given a decided advantage.

We were told that if the farmers in the United States would not continue to expand sugar production, we not only would help to stabilize conditions in Cuba by importing about one-third of our sugar requirements from them, but that, in turn, by helping to raise sugar prices in Cuba, we would greatly increase their purchasing power and that would lead to a tremendous increase in the volume of our exports to Cuba. Much has been said about the amount of our farm products being bought by Cuba. It seems that the facts do not bear out many of the statements that have been made.

My attention was recently called to a statement prepared and published by the education committee of the Sugar Cane League located in New Orleans. This statement, among other things, shows that about 75 percent of the flour shipped from the United States to Cuba is made from wheat imported from Canada for grinding in bond and exported to Cuba. Only during a period of a few months in 1938–39 has wheat grown in the United States been used to produce flour for Cuba in any considerable volume. That was during the period when the A. A. A. subsidized home-grown wheat to the extent of 20 or 30 cents a bushel in order to stimulate exports of surpluses which were piling up in this country.

Previous to that time, and since the subsidies have been withdrawn, we are again supplying Cuba with flour made from Canadian wheat.

It has always been my contention that the wheat shipped in from Canada and milled in bond and the flour shipped out was in direct competition with the flour made from wheat produced here in the United States.

The question naturally comes up: Would not the farmer, who produces the so-called surplus crops such as wheat, be much better off if domestic sugar production were allowed to expand and absorb some of the acreage now devoted to these surplus price-depressing crops?

In my home State and surrounding States, we are told that we are producing a surplus of wheat. At the same time we are also producers of sugar.

In the Red River Valley of North Dakota and Minnesota, we have a soil, a rainfall, and a climate which is ideal for the production of sugar beets, and it would be quite possible for us to increase production to the extent of thousands of acres and of thousands of tons of sugar; and we can do that so efficiently and economically that we could provide the people of the United States with this sugar at a reasonable retail price.

The whole argument for this system of reciprocal-trade agreements back in 1934, when the original act was passed, centered around the proposition that the United States had burdensome agricultural surpluses which, it was said, we could sell in foreign markets if, in turn, we would permit the importation of special foreign commodities. In other words, the whole theme was that the solution of the farm problem was to find a way to export burdensome surpluses.

According to the record, a number of foreign countries have made what is called concessions to us. A very careful study of these seems to indicate that, in fact, they have been no more than gestures. In other words, some of these same foreign countries have proceeded with agreements to set up all manner of restrictions so that, in fact, there has been little or no increase in volume of our exports as a result of the concessions we are supposed to have received.

It is true, at the same time, that there have been other reasons for failure of the reciprocal-trade agreements to bring about an increase in our exports.

We must recognize the fact that we have passed through a series of very trying years, and, as a result, for several years we did not have large quantities of certain crops to export. That, however, does not apply to the years 1937, 1938, and 1939.

In other words, during that period the United States had an abundance of products to export, in my opinion largely due to underconsumption here at home; but, at any rate, we had a surplus. In the meantime, other policies were adopted in connection with the A. A. A. program, so that instead of exporting more cotton, wheat, tobacco, and other items, in most cases we have exported less, except for a short period during which a third policy was adopted—that of subsidizing exports of wheat and cotton.

Another illustration is the concessions granted by the Netherlands with reference to the quota on wheat. But it seems that while they appeared to increase the quotas of wheat from the United States, this was only on condition that the amount of wheat desired and the quality desired would be available at the time desired and at a competitive world-price level.

In other words, while we appeared to get a better quota, they reserved the right to buy in other markets if they could buy at better prices. It is true that for a short period recently we did export larger quantities of wheat to the Netherlands, but apparently this was only during the period when we paid them to take our wheat. In other words, by paying a subsidy we did succeed in exporting some wheat.

I have gone through much of the evidence submitted before the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate, and other reports, and I have yet to find other gains in our agricultural export trade. In other words, the burdensome surpluses are still with us. You may call them ever-normal granary or by any other name. We have not yet solved the problem, and concessions secured from foreign countries in our reciprocal-trade agreements do not seem to have improved our export situation to any extent.

Perhaps some reference should be made to the fact that with the outbreak of the new European war, the first of last September, our position becomes even more critical because European countries have almost completely ceased purchasing farm products from the United States because of their desire to reserve all dollar exchange for the purpose of buying military materials. Thus, foreign concessions to us are all temporarily canceled while our concessions to the foreign countries continue in operation.

In contrast to the concessions foreign countries have granted to us, a very different situation exists with reference to the concessions we have made to foreign countries. It was not intended, when the original act was passed, that our tariffs on agricultural products were to be reduced and that new imports of farm products were to be encouraged. All of the talk centered around preserving our agricultural tariff rates by permitting the importation of other commodities which could be brought in without injury to American agriculture, labor, and industry.

Almost exactly the opposite situation has developed. The State Department—apparently with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture—has proceeded to lower rates of duty on practically every manner of agricultural products. This applies to a long list of grains and seeds, including feed and food products made from grains and seeds. It applies to all manner of fibers and textiles. It applies to a long list of special commodities, including such important ones as sugar and tobacco. It applies to cattle and meat and important dairy products like cheese, together with a long list of other livestock items and livestock products. And it applies to fruits and vegetables, and special items like potatoes, maple sugar, and sirup and honey.

I mention some of these items by name because, in the Northwest, we produce tremendous quantities of such special crops as sugar beets, potatoes, and honey in our effort to find profitable crops to take the place of wheat.

In my part of the country, quite a percentage of the land is devoted to pasture and forage crops as a basis for livestock industry. Here we produce a surplus of wheat, and are trying desperately to find some way to get rid of burdensome surpluses.

The livestock industry and the feed crops to support the livestock industry naturally are the subject of great interest.

We were building up a large business in alfalfa seed, clover seed, and so forth, and the State Department comes along and reduces the duty, and all but ruins that new branch of farming in the Northwest States where the choicest kinds of seeds can be grown.

We attempt to build up our livestock industry, and along comes the State Department and reduces the duty on cattle. It is true that in the first agreement with Canada, rather limited quotas were established, although they were far too large at that.

Then the Canadian agreement was revised, and lower tariffs were prescribed at various points, while quotas were either eliminated, or larger quotas granted. Step by step, each new trade agreement makes some new concessions which leave us literally dumfounded, and each new effort on our part to improve our own condition is destroyed by some action of the trade-agreements organization.

Some may think that the potato growers need no protection, but they do.

In the Red River Valley of the North we produce the choicest sort of seed potatoes—certified seed—and had succeeded in developing a good market especially in the Southern States for this certified seed, and also had a good market for table potatoes for fall and winter use. But apparently the State Department thinks that new seed potatoes should be imported each year from foreign countries, and apparently also it feels that new potatoes should be imported from tropical areas for use during the winter months.

In other words, tremendous damage has been done, both to our seed-potato industry, and to our table-potato producers through the trade agreements, especially with Canada and Cuba.

What I have said applies equally to the products of the dairy farmer and the poultry farmer. There is no reason why our people cannot produce as good cheese of different kinds as is produced in other parts of the world. We can grow the feed; we have the cows to produce the milk and cream; and we have the labor to produce the cheese; yet in half a dozen or more agreements the duty on cheese has been reduced, with the evident effect of keeping the price of milk and cream down below parity; evidently also with the idea that it is better to import our food from other countries even though our farmers are driven to bankruptcy. This is equally true with reference to poultry products. Surely, every kind of poultry product can be produced in the United States in sufficient quantities to provide all domestic requirements. Just why the State Department thinks it better to import poultry products is more than I can understand.

During the last year, 1939, the average price of poultry and eggs was below the price back in the pre-war days, 1909–14, yet our poultry farmers were paying 21 percent more for everything which they purchased. In other words, poultry farmers were receiving only 77 percent of parity. Many other illustrations might be cited.

I want to refer a little further to the duty on honey. Surely, the United States can produce as fine bees and as fine flowers and blossoms and as fine nectar as can be produced any place in the world. If we wish honey, there is no reason why we cannot produce literally millions of pounds so that everyone in the United States can have all of the honey he desires.

In the United States production of honey averages about 160,000,000 pounds annually. With 130,000,000 people, this means that we consume something over 1 pound of honey per capita during each year. The duty on honey from Cuba was 2.4 cents per pound. Even if that duty did help to hold the price of honey up to a reasonable level, it cannot be claimed by anyone that it resulted in an increase of more than 3 cents on the amount of honey consumed in the United States by each person during a full year.

Thus, the possible extreme effect of the tariff might be 3 cents for each consumer; but, on the other hand, it might help thousands of farmers to make a living, while bringing to the consumers a very great pleasure of having honey on the table.

But the State Department thought otherwise. They decided that the duty should be cut 50 percent. I do not know whether this saved the consumers a cent on the price of their honey or not, but I do know that it has raised havoc with our farmers who are trying to make a living while, at the same time, supplying American consumers.

The result was that the foreign farmers are finding a market in this country for honey.

Mr. President, it is mighty difficult for me to figure out any possible justification for a reduction in rate of duty on farm products, when those products are selling below parity, unless it is the determined purpose of the State Department—and apparently with the approval of the Department of Agriculture—to lower the rate of tariff protection on all farm products merely because they have failed in their effort to solve the farm problem in any other manner.

In other words, merely because they have not been able to find a way to protect the cotton growers in the Southern States, all other farmers in the United States must be brought down to the level of the cotton sharecroppers or to the level of the poorly paid farmers of foreign countries.

It is a common argument that the amount of imports of farm products is such a small percentage that it does not amount to anything. But this argument is one of the most dangerous and one of the most fallacious ever brought into an economic picture.

We know that by a very small percentage added to our regular rate of interest, it is possible for a farmer, over a period of years, completely to pay for a farm. We know, equally well, that if the farmer is receiving only relatively little below parity, it will not be long before the farm will be mortgaged and he will lose his home.

The total quantity of agricultural imports has increased through the years that the trade agreements have been in effect, and it must be conceded that imported farm products have tended to keep prices down.

So the battle goes on, and the State Department drives to bring down the prices by the importation of agricultural products, so that our farmers are being put out of business, while the Department of Agriculture proceeds along absolutely contrary lines.

The Agriculture Department asks for increased appropriations for parity payments to offset the loss to our farmers through the reciprocal-trade agreements. Our farm exports have decreased and farm imports have increased. Our losses on farm exports and imports practically balance the appropriations for parity payments.

It would not be fair to the people of my State or indeed to the farmers of the United States as a whole, if I failed to make passing reference to the effects of continuing this program. The President and Secretaries Hull and Wallace would not be fighting so hard for this trade-agreements program if they did not intend to continue to use it.

Recently, we have recognized Australia in the same way that previously we had recognized Canada, and now we exchange ministers with that great colony of the British Empire. Of course, we all know that the purpose of this is to begin the preliminary conversations necessary before a trade agreement is negotiated with Australia and New Zealand.

Undoubtedly the duty on wool and mohair will then be reduced, as well as the duty on butter and possibly many other farm products. We know that temporarily the negotiations with Argentina and Uruguay have been suspended, and why? Evidently pending the passage of this joint resolution. From all past experience, it would seem to be the definite purpose to continue the lowering of rates of duty on farm products. What possible excuse could otherwise be given for reducing one item after another?

For example, is the reduced tariff of 15 percent on honey about to bring the consumers of the United States to a state of stabilization?

Must we call on the farmers of other countries to produce honey for our own people? But if the farmer who is producing on a commercial scale is driven to bankruptcy, who then is going to support that farmer? And once the American farmer is reduced to even greater poverty than at the present time and supported by the Government, is it not perfectly clear that foreign farmers will rapidly advance their prices to such an extent that American consumers will be exploited by foreign producers?

The whole thing simply does not make sense. I sincerely hope that our action will not be based on political or partisan reasons. Let us lay aside partisan considerations for a moment and reject this proposal. Incidentally we are in the midst of world chaos.

There is no emergency which justifies blindly continuing this program—one department of Government paying the farmers to cut down production and another department letting down the bars to foreign farm products to keep down the prices.

Mr. President, in plain English that is a crazy system, and for the life of me I cannot see how anyone can conscientiously and consistently advance a principle of that kind.

Let us suspend operations for a while and give our own farmers at least a little chance to work back to a more prosperous condition.

The farmers have been promised parity prices. But there is no chance for parity for the farmers as long as these trade agreements provide for an exchange of a few favored manufactured products for foreign agricultural products at a price substantially below parity.

Mr. President, in the 1932 platform of the Democratic Party I find this statement in regard to tariff for revenue:

> We advocate a competitive tariff for revenue, with a fact-finding Tariff Commission free from Executive interference.

I do not know whether or not all Senators listening to me got that. Let me read it again. The 1932 platform of the Democratic Party had this to say about tariff for revenue:

> We advocate a competitive tariff for revenue, with a fact-finding Tariff Commission free from Executive interference.

Of course, some may say that a platform is only something on which to get in and not to be observed or carried out after one is elected. That may be true. However, if my memory serves me correctly, the present Chief Executive, who was then a candidate for office, stated that he endorsed that Democratic platform of 1932, 100 percent.

Mr. President, we are a long way from having a competitive tariff for revenue, with a fact-finding Tariff Commission free from Executive interference. What we have at the present time is a tariff-making Chief Executive, without the interference of the Tariff Commission, without the interference of the Senate or the Congress of the United States, and without the interference of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, that is the situation as I see it.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, is there any amendment pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. PEPPER. I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to insert the following new section:

> SEC. —. No foreign-trade agreement hereafter entered into under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, no modification hereafter made in any such foreign-trade agreement, and, after the expiration of 240 days after the date of enactment of this joint resolution, no foreign-trade agreement, and no modification of a foreign-trade agreement, heretofore entered into under such section, shall provide for, or contain any provision which permits, the importation into the United States in any one calendar year of any foreign agricultural or horticultural commodity which is in substantial competition with any like or similar domestic commodity, as determined by the United States Tariff Commission, at a rate of duty lower than that in effect with respect to such foreign commodity on June 12, 1934, after the quantity of the foreign commodity previously imported into the United States at such lower rate during such calendar year equals 125 percent of the total average annual quantity of such foreign commodity imported into the United States during the 5-year period from January 1, 1929, to January 1, 1934. As used in this section, the term "agricultural or horticultural commodity" includes any article which on the date of enactment of this joint resolution is classified as an agricultural import in the schedule of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, in the Department of Commerce, designated as "Schedule A, Statistical Classification of Imports Into the United States."

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I am sorry that the technicalities of the amendment require it to be longer than it should be to make its intent clearly apparent on its face. All it provides, in substance, is that the executive department, which negotiates the treaties, may not allow an importation of any agricultural or horticultural commodity in excess of 25 percent more of that commodity than was permitted to come in on an average annual basis for the 5-year period prior to the adoption of the Trade Agreements Act, provided that that commodity is in competition with any agricultural or horticultural commodity domestically produced, as found by the United States Tariff Commission.

In other words, the amendment gives to the executive department power to permit a 25-percent increase in the annual quantity of an agricultural or horticultural commodity to be imported into this country, even though it be in competition with domestic production, but it limits possible competition to an increase of 25 percent.

So it seems to me that the amendment lays down a fair principle. It simply provides that if the subject of any negotiation is an agricultural or horticultural commodity, our Tariff Commission shall determine whether or not that commodity is in competition with a commodity of like character domestically produced. If it is of that character, it is the duty of the negotiator of the trade agreement to limit the quantity of increase to 25 percent more than was being annually imported, on an average, during the 5-year period prior to the adoption of the original Trade Agreements Act in 1934.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The 25-percent limitation is applied in the contract with the country with which the negotiation is made?

Mr. PEPPER. That is correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What happens under the subsequent application of the unconditional most-favored-nation policy? Suppose the market is flooded 100 percent with imports from other countries than the one with which the negotiation has occurred?

Mr. PEPPER. I think the question the Senator raises would be a lesser evil than is permissible under the existing law, because now, in the case of tomatoes, for example, which come into this country in competition with tomato production in my State, the increase has been 56 percent over the importations in the 5-year period prior to the Trade Agreements Act in 1934; and my amendment would limit the possible increase from all countries to 25 percent. So whatever the incidents might be as affecting our domestic production, they could not be as great as they could be under existing law.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I concede that the Senator is proceeding in the direction of a limitation; but I am trying to discover whether or not the limitation finally amounts to anything so long as we proceed under the unconditional most-favored-nation policy.

Mr. PEPPER. It only limits the scope of the bargaining of our executive department in dealing with foreign countries on this type of commodity. Under my amendment all the incidents of the existing law would apply, but the scope would be diminished.

Mr. VANDENBERG. However, the objective which the Senator seeks could be nullified by imports from other countries under the unconditional most-favored-nation policy.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, generally speaking, in the cases I have principally in mind, the imports come from a relatively restricted area. For example, tomatoes in competition with domestic production come principally from Cuba. To illustrate the basis of the amendment, I read from an article entitled "Farm Imports Under Trade Agreements," by R. B. Schwenger, which was published by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics:

> Hence, it is natural to expect them to increase not only our farm exports (as data presented in the December issue of the Agricultural Situation indicate that they have) but to increase our farm imports as well. It is not desirable, however, that they should increase imports of farm products which can be produced effectively in this country, and it is especially undesirable that they should have a disruptive influence on domestic farm markets. An examination of available data indicates that the agreements have tended to increase farm imports, but that safeguards included in the texts of the agreements have prevented any increases which might have disturbed domestic markets.

That was the intent behind the action of our executive department in the negotiation of these agreements. Later——

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I have only 15 minutes, but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILEY. Along the line of the questions by the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], if we should enter into the agreement with Cuba of which the Senator speaks, under the terms of his amendment, imports would be limited to 25 percent above a certain mark.

Mr. PEPPER. That is correct.

Mr. WILEY. But under the unconditional most-favored-nation clause, all the other nations of the world entitled to the benefit of the unconditional most-favored-nation clause could ship in the same quantity. That would inundate the market.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I am not expanding the existing authority. I am contracting it. So, whatever the ills are, in the cases with respect to which I have had an opportunity to look into the details, they would be diminished to at most 25 percent by my amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. It occurs to me that the nations claiming benefits under the unconditional most-favored-nation clause must share the same fate as the other signatory to the treaty. A favored nation could not obtain any advantage. It would share the same fate as the nation with which the treaty was negotiated.

Mr. PEPPER. Of course, the able Senator is correct. It is unlikely that such an agreement would work out practically to our disadvantage. The thought I wish to convey is that under the existing untrammeled authority of the executive department a competition of 56 percent is permitted with tomato production in Florida, for example. Under my amendment no more than a 25-percent increase from all countries could be allowed over the average annual importations for the 5-year period prior to the enactment of the Trade Agreements Act. Whatever incidental benefits some other countries might obtain under the amendment would be much larger under the existing law than they would be if the amendment were adopted.

Reading further from the report of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics:

> The possibility of increased agricultural imports from trade-agreement countries disrupting domestic farm markets, however, has been carefully guarded against, not only by refusing to reduce United States farm tariffs sufficiently or in such a way as to disturb domestic markets but also by introducing specific safeguards where reductions were made on the more important so-called "competitive" agricultural imports.

Mr. President, if that had been the policy actually consummated, I should not have offered this amendment. But let us look at what has happened, for example, to tomatoes. In the year 1926–27 Mexico sent into the United States 272 carloads of tomatoes; in 1927–28, 316 carloads; in 1928–29, 335 carloads; in 1929–30, 592 carloads; in 1930–31, 395 carloads; in 1931–32, 158 carloads; in 1932–33, 77 carloads; in 1933–34, 13 carloads; in 1934–35, 9 carloads; in 1935–36, 60 carloads; in 1936–37, 137 carloads; in 1937–38, none; and in 1938–39, 12 carloads.

Between 1926–27 and 1938–39, Mexico's export of tomatoes into the New York market diminished from 272 carloads to 12. Mexican tomatoes are subject to a tariff of 3 cents a pound. In the same time, Cuban exports into New York market increased from 610 carloads in 1926–27 to 1,746 carloads in 1938–39, showing that a constantly increasing quantity of Cuban tomatoes has been coming into the United States in competition with domestic production.

As I have said, there has been an increase of 56 percent in the quantity of Cuban tomatoes coming into the United States in the 5-year period since the trade agreement was adopted as compared to the quantity that came into the United States in the 5-year period prior to the trade agreement.

During the same time Florida, in 1926–27, sent into the same market 1,080 cars, and in the year 1938–39, the same number, 1,080 cars. We have not had our natural increase.

What has been happening? As a report I have here from the Tariff Commission indicates, Cuban exports have been constantly increasing, while Florida exports of this commodity into that market have stood still or increased relatively little.

I read a moment ago from the Bureau of Agricultural Economics explanation of the trade agreement, and it said that, in the first place, they had not allowed any trade agreement to be negotiated with respect to an agricultural or horticultural commodity in a case where there is substantial competition in this country, and that where they had allowed it they had put safeguards around it and made it of no possible effect.

I read now from the figures that were given me also by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics. Tomatoes are given a tariff reduction, and for the months of December, January, and February, instead of there being a tariff of 2.2 cents a pound, it is only 1.8 cents a pound during those 3 months.

In the year 1936–37, in the month of December, Florida shipped 233 cars of tomatoes and Cuba shipped 561 cars; in January, Florida, 555 cars, and Cuba 615 cars; in February, Florida, 1,117 cars, and Cuba, 479 cars.

In the year 1937–38, in the month of December, Florida shipments were 214 cars, Cuban shipments, 607 cars; in January, Florida shipments, 181 cars, Cuban shipments, 656 cars; and in February, Florida shipments, 1,079 cars, and Cuban shipments, 691 cars.

In 1938–39, in December, Florida shipped 317 cars and Cuba, 462; in January, Florida shipped 763 cars, and Cuba, 665; in February, Florida, 1,378 cars, and Cuba, 412 cars.

Does that look as if they safeguarded the domestic production when we sent out considerably more than Cuba did in the same time? In other words, they said, "We are not negotiating these agreements except in cases where there is no substantial competition." Can it be said that there is no substantial competition when we sent in considerably more than Cuba did?

This was the intent of the law, Senators, as stated by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics:

The possibility of increased agricultural imports from trade-agreement countries disrupting domestic farm markets, however, has been carefully guarded against, not only by refusing to reduce the tariff but—

It proceeds to say—

by imposing adequate safeguards.

Yet they have allowed a competition which has been 55 percent greater in the 5-year period since the trade agreement than in the 5-year period prior to the trade agreement in respect to tomatoes from Florida. That has had a very injurious effect upon tomato production in the State of Florida. Cuba has, as the Bureau of Agricultural Economics report further says, a transportation advantage over the State of Florida. They send in their tomatoes by shipboard, about three or four shiploads at a time. They reach the New York market on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays ordinarily. We quite generally ship by rail, and, as soon as our commodity is fed into that market, it meets the flooded situation that has already been caused by the great accumulation of tomatoes from Cuba.

I pick out that case because it is illustrative.

I have been to the State Department about it; I have been to the Bureau of Agriculture about it, but have not secured satisfaction to which I believe the people of Florida are entitled. This amendment is fair to all and I hope will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWELLENBACH in the chair). The time of the Senator from Florida has expired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER].

Mr. PEPPER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the demand of the Senator from Florida for the yeas and nays seconded?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. —. (a) There is hereby established a Nonpartisan Foreign Trade Commission to be composed of five members, to be appointed by the President after consultation with the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Secretary of State. One such member shall represent agriculture, one shall represent labor, one shall represent industry, one shall represent investment, and one shall represent government. Each member shall be a person of broad practical experience. The members of the Commission shall receive compensation at the rate of $25 a day for time spent in attending and traveling to and from meetings of the Commission or in otherwise exercising the functions of the Commission.

(b) It shall be the duty of the Commission to make a full and complete study and survey of tariff problems, foreign currency, and international trade problems in general, with a view to determining whether the trade-agreements program of the United States should be continued, modified, or terminated. The Commission shall report to the President and to Congress not later than January 3, 1941.

(c) The Commission shall have power to hold hearings and to sit and act at such places and times, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. Subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the Chairman of the Commission and shall be served by any person designated by him. The provisions of sections 102 to 104, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes shall apply in case of any failure of any witness to comply with any subpena, or to testify when summoned, under authority of this section.

(d) The Commission shall have power to employ and fix the compensation of such officers, experts, and employees as it deems necessary for the performance of its duties, without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment of officers and employees of the United States, but the compensation so fixed shall not exceed the compensation fixed under the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, for comparable duties. The Commission is authorized to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of the departments and agencies in the executive branch of the Government.

(e) The Commission may authorize any one or more persons to conduct any part of such study and investigation on behalf of the Commission, and for such purpose any persons so authorized may hold such hearings, and require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, administer such oaths, and take such testimony, as the Commission may authorize. In any such case subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the Chairman of the Commission and shall be served by any person designated by him.

(f) No foreign trade agreement shall be entered into under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, until after the Commission has made its report as provided in subsection (b) of this section.

(g) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $——— to carry out the provisions of this section.

(h) All authority conferred by this section shall terminate on January 3, 1941.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, while there is a good attendance of Senators, may I suggest that there are only two or three more amendments, as I understand, and we are anxious to conclude the consideration of the joint resolution and have a final vote on it as early as possible this afternoon, and then adjourn over until Monday. I hope Senators will remain here, if they can, so that quorum calls may be avoided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I wish to speak briefly concerning my amendment which calls for the establishment of a nonpartisan foreign-trade commission.

It must be evident that the issues before us transcend the boundaries of party politics. There is no place for political partisanship in a subject so truly national and international in scope.

I have asked for the establishment of a nonpartisan foreign-trade commission which will give a thorough opportunity for all the facts related to foreign trade and our tariff policy to be assembled, with a view to helping the Government set up a definitive and clearly formulated foreign-trade policy. At the present time there are so many conflicts between our foreign policy and our domestic policy that most people are thoroughly bewildered. They do not know what course of action our Government should take, and the same confusion of thought seems to mark the current discussions of this problem wherever heard.

Mr. President, under my amendment, if agreed to, no further trade agreements would be entered into until the commission had reported its findings, which would not be later than January 3, 1941.

There have been those who have contended that our desire is to interject politics into tariff making. My amendment is clearly designated to avoid any such action. The amendment calls for a commission to be composed of five members, to be appointed by the President after consultation with the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Secretary of State.

Secretary Hull is reported to have said that there is a tariff lobbyist behind every post in Washington. If so, no doubt he was referring to representatives of American labor, agriculture, and industry who have been exercising their right to petition the Government. These persons have a right to be heard. They have a right to come to Washington and let Congress know the actual facts of foreign trade as they see and know them. They have a right to support or oppose our administrative negotiation of trade treaties if they desire to do so, and as best meets their needs.

Surely the representatives of business and agriculture have just as much right to be in Washington as have the Government-paid agents of the State Department who use Government funds to sustain a special governmental point of view. If there is anything more ridiculous than trying to beat down the representatives of American principles by indiscriminate remarks about tariff lobbyists, I do not know what it is.

The real trouble is that we do not have enough true representatives of our national rights in Washington. We have too many people here who think the rights of foreign governments come before the rights of Uncle Sam. I am not for that.

To listen to the remarks of some ill-informed persons, one would think our Government had set up a high tariff on everything that enters our borders. Of course, that is not true. The United States has one of the largest free-trade lists of any nation. Sixty percent of our total imports come in duty-free. I refer to such items as rubber, tin, coffee, tea, silk, and others. All during this long discussion of trade agreements very little has been said about our free list. That list means that we are already leaning over backward on the side of free trade. We permit more goods to enter duty-free than those on which we collect a tariff, and yet very little is said about it.

The trade treaties concern themselves solely with articles which are highly competitive, and for that reason are subject to duty. The extent to which this country or any other country can permit a permanent increase of competitive imports is strictly limited if national disaster is to be averted. Our country is the only great Nation in the world that does not insist on drawing a sharp national line around our foreign trade to protect our national interests; and yet both here and abroad it is customary for those who would undermine our market to refer to the American people as "Uncle Shylock." Could anything be more unfair?

We have heard much irresponsible talk about closing down the inefficient sectors of American industry. During the past 6 years the trade revisionists have been constantly lowering the tariff. They could have raised it, but instead they chose to lower it. Their argument has been that they were justified in bringing in certain imports of a highly competitive nature because these articles could be more efficiently produced in other lands. By that they mean that the goods can be purchased for less money elsewhere; and, of course, they can. The foreign labor that is sweated to work for 4 to 10 cents an hour can always underbid American labor that works for from 40 to 65 cents an hour.

Secretary Wallace referred to the American lace industry as one of these inefficient industries. That means that our Pennsylvania lace makers are better paid and work shorter hours than those of Britain and France. Judged by that standard, Pennsylvania lace makers might be called inefficient, although I should never, never refer to them in that way. I believe that our foreign-trade policy should be based upon our need for materials that we do not produce. If there is any lace which American lace makers cannot make, I am willing to vote to have it come in; but, first of all, I want to be thoroughly sure that our workers cannot make it here.

If we want to increase our foreign trade, there is one sure way to do so: That is, to make our domestic trade profitable. It has been clearly shown over a long period of time that when domestic trade is prosperous in this country we have our fullest volume of foreign trade. It is not difficult to explain this, for when we have a larger domestic trade we have a greater natural demand for many of the products coming from abroad which are noncompetitive in character and which can easily be geared into our domestic economy. That is the true way to build up foreign trade. That is the proven and accepted way of the past, and the only way in which we can conduct foreign trade without committing national suicide. Other nations operate on this basis. It is only reasonable that we should follow these proven principles, which have temporarily and tragically been abandoned during recent years.

All of this talk concerning our hope of building up an export trade by giving away our American markets to low-wage-policy importers is nothing less than ridiculous. The only way we can be sure that our foreign-trade dollar spent abroad will be returned to us is to have it earmarked. Otherwise we may be sure that the American dollar spent for imports will be spent by those who get it in world markets, where prices are quite generally below our own. The buyer always is looking for the lowest market price, and the foreign buyer will not find that in this land of high wages, which go to make up a large part of our high prices.

We expect to do some additional trading with South America. I hope we shall do so. But I believe that when we extend credits to Latin American governments we should be sure that the money we send down there, at least a substantial part of it, is earmarked for buying American goods. We must be sure that a fair return is made to our own country. Otherwise our people will be taxed to raise funds with which our neighbors to the south may go shopping across the Atlantic or the Pacific.

It is to be expected that countries which obtain credit from us will use that credit where it will buy the most. If we advance credits to South America, we should make certain that definite arrangements are made for the purchase of a sizable amount of American-made goods.

In the extension of credits guarantees should be written into the agreements to make sure that the money will be spent for goods manufactured under fair labor standards. It is unfair to American labor and industry to compel our fellow countrymen to observe certain fair standards of wages and hours and then to allow the State Department to make negotiations for goods which have no labor standards whatever written into their production. The conditions of labor in regard to health, wages, hours, and collective bargaining must be maintained.

I take second place to no one in firm insistence on these rights, and certainly I will not remain silent while these standards are being unmercifully beaten down by a foreign-trade program negotiated by the State Department without reference to the will of the American people through their representatives in Congress. Our best hope of maintaining our fair labor standards in foreign trade is with South American countries, and we shall be doing our sister Republics to the south a great humanitarian service by insisting on the maintenance of these standards there as a condition for effective foreign trade.

I do not know anyone in Congress who would not like to see the Government made more efficient. I do not know anyone who is opposed to a scientific tariff. Personally, I favor giving tariff specialists the first chance to work out the schedules. After they have done their work, congressional hearings should be conducted so that the representatives of the people may have a full right to be heard. Finally, Congress should take action; for tariff treaties, tariff agreements, or whatsoever the name, are of concern both to the House and the Senate under the Constitution.

Some say that this would make for logrolling and would curtail tariff efficiency. I do not wish to attempt to deny this assertion. In fact, I am sure that under our representative form of government various pressure groups will be present with us. That is to say, we should frankly admit that the American Federation of Labor, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, the American Legion, the National Grange, the National Association of Manufacturers, the National Education Association, and many other organizations have representatives in Washington. They have a right to have them here. When they no longer have this right, we shall have a Fascist government here, and that is the last thing I want. So I say it is better to keep our Government accessible to the representatives of the people, even though tariff making may not be 100 percent efficient, than to erect in the State Department a high-handed dictatorship which is determined to rule or ruin.

Trade-agreement propagandists say that these treaties or agreements make for peace. If they did make for peace I should regard that fact as in their favor. Unfortunately, we have nothing tangible to show that the agreements have made peace. It is a fact that the nations with which we concluded some of the agreements are at war. It is also a fact that the agreements almost exclusively concern items of commerce that are highly competitive; and when the sale of highly competitive products is increased, it increases the sources of economic friction and international ill will.

An increase of foreign trade, and a scramble for trade markets lies back of more than a score of wars during the nineteenth century. It was a mad race for markets that caused Germany and Great Britain to battle during the World War. The same struggle is going on today. Who can say that attempts to increase the exchange of highly competitive products among the markets of the world will make for peace? All the force of history and contemporary experience rises up to deny this theory.

These trade treaties have not brought peace in the past. We have no assurance that they will bring peace in the future. At this time we are in no position to say what the future will bring.

Mr. President, in his address of March 25, my colleague [Mr. GUFFEY] quoted Frank Knox, Republican Vice Presidential candidate of 4 years ago, as saying last year:

> To sell American farm products abroad, we must buy some of what our foreign customers have to sell. You cannot always sell and never buy in foreign markets.

Mr. President, this is a point of view which I would not attempt to contest. Assuredly we have a responsibility in foreign trade, and it is one that we should not neglect. At no time have I taken any opposite point of view. I agree with the statement of Mr. Knox which my colleague quoted. However, the point under consideration at that time was not our belief in foreign trade, but rather the right of Congress to ratify trade agreements. Since this was the issue at stake, I wrote to Frank Knox asking his judgment in this matter just prior to the vote that was taken on the Pittman amendment. He honored me with a reply, and made a statement relative to our relations with South America which is of great importance.

I have traveled through this great continent. It reminds me of our own country back in 1881, over half a century ago, when so many of our citizens went to find a new life for themselves in the great open spaces of the West. Such is the challenge of South America today.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, my letter to Mr. Knox and his letter of March 30, 1940.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Without objection, the letters will be printed in the RECORD.

The letters referred to are as follows:

MARCH 27, 1940.

Mr. FRANK KNOX,
Chicago Daily News, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR FRANK: On Monday my colleague, Senator GUFFEY, in speaking on the reciprocal-trade agreements—the legislation now before us—made reference to your approval of this program, together with other eminent persons.

Your adherence to this point of view is well known. I am wondering, however, if you are opposed to having each treaty referred back to the Senate or to Congress for confirmation before it is actually put in operation. I should like to have your thought in this matter.

Most cordially yours,

JAMES J. DAVIS.

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS,
Chicago, March 28, 1940.

Senator JAMES J. DAVIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JIM: Thanks for your inquiry of March 27.

I have been favorable to the principle of reciprocal-trade agreements right along. Reciprocity is, as you know, definitely a Republican doctrine, being first enunciated by James G. Blaine, endorsed in his last speech by President McKinley, and being a part of four or five national Republican platforms. Likewise the principle of flexible tariff is of Republican origin.

I am very loath to have the Republicans in Congress identify themselves with the idea of opposition to reciprocity. However, I am also emphatically opposed to enlargement of the executive authority beyond the limits of the Constitution. I think that the power to make treaties should be retained where it is. And you don't make a reciprocity treaty any less a treaty by calling it an agreement. The principle of confirmation by the Senate of all treaties is a principle which ought not to be disturbed. So far as the statement of general principles go, I don't believe any significant number of Republicans will differ from these which I have made, but here is where constructive legislative ability is required—to maintain the authority of the Senate to approve or reject treaties with other nations and at the same time to prevent the selfish log-rolling which usually characterizes any effort to change tariff rates. One suggestion I heard to prevent this was to provide for a majority approval of future reciprocity treaties by majority vote in both Houses and to limit action by Congress on such treaties to either approval or rejection, that is, providing against their amendment when up for action by Congress. I have not thought this latter suggestion through, but it seems to me worthy of study.

As a matter of fact, Jim, in the present state of world affairs, the promotion of the conventional sort of reciprocity by treaty or otherwise is largely impractical while the war lasts, and will probably continue to be impractical for some time after the war ends. We ought to face this situation realistically and study what our relations with South America, at least, ought to be. I spent most of the winter a year ago down there, and I came to be completely convinced that South America offered us a marvelous opportunity for expansion of foreign trade if we would only constructively help to develop those countries down there.

I think it might be true statesmanship to announce to the world that since the whole of the Western Hemisphere hereafter must be regarded as a single unit for its defense against aggression, that we have decided to treat it as a unit in an economic sense and will seek to promote, without regard to our relations with other parts of the world, the freest possible intercourse with the United States and the removal of every possible barrier to a free interchange of goods and services. Having notified the rest of the world that what we did in South America bore no relation to our course of action elsewhere, I would then proceed to make the most liberal possible arrangements with those nations down there, taking them into our economy and using their raw materials and farm products and selling to them our manufactured goods. Of course, a lot of short-sighted people would immediately cry out that this would be subjecting some producers and some farmers in the United States to foreign competition. The answer to this is that we can, if we choose, make the whole continent of South America a part of our economic community, just as the great West before the Civil War was made a part of the economic community of the United States, then confined to a strip along the Atlantic coast. Taking the great West into our economic orbit made the East rich and the West prosperous. Indeed, it was while this was going on that the United States enjoyed its greatest era of prosperity. South America, if handled wisely, would serve exactly the same purpose to the whole United States as the great West did for the eastern United States 75 years ago. It may take a little imagination and a little knowledge of history to visualize this, but the basis for such a vision is there.

Since I have been quoted by some of your distinguished Democratic colleagues on this subject, I would have no possible objection to your having this letter made a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Yours sincerely,

FRANK KNOX.

Mr. DAVIS. My colleague the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY] also blamed the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act for the economic difficulties since 1930. However, it is common knowledge that these difficulties reach back much further than that date. Surely my colleague knows that the stock-market crash preceded the enactment of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act. Surely, also, he is informed that the attack on our economic system by the long-hour, low-wage countries had begun much before 1930. Surely he knows that the 4 to 10 cents an hour wage countries had been at work undermining American standards of from 50 to 60 cents an hour for a period long before 1930. Surely also he knows that all during the twenties we had subsidized foreign trade through large-scale loans to foreign countries which were never repaid. The policy started then is being continued today in another form, when through the share-the-wealth program of diminished tariff agreements we adopt the communistic ideal of giving away what we have, with the naive belief that by giving what we have others will automatically come to have more.

Let me assert that I should be willing to compete without tariff protection with the nations of the world if their cost of production were the equivalent of our own. If these agreements are so fair, why should not the representatives of the people have a right to review them in Congress?

My colleague, when talking in the Senate Finance Committee, made remarks that are not a part of the record, at which time he referred to the prosperous condition of this country under the low-tariff scales of Woodrow Wilson. It must not be forgotten, however, that the effect of the war in those years was to bar our foreign imports, because the nations of the world were using up their own production at that time, and not exporting. The highest tariff wall we ever have had, in reality, was the effective prevention of imports in the economic crisis caused by the World War, when we were called upon to export in large quantities while our imports were comparatively small.

Again, my colleague referred to the history of the American tariff; but he did not make clear the fact that the low tariff of the period from 1892 to 1896 brought a great victory for the high-tariff cause in the election of William McKinley. He did not mention the great industrial prosperity that arose in this country with the coming of tin-plate protection, which advanced in an amazing way after this infant industry was given the protection it deserved. Indeed, what my colleague failed to say about the benefits of the protective tariff would fill 10 volumes.

My colleague also quoted from President McKinley. He made clear that he believed in reciprocity treaties, and of that there can be no doubt. In fact, Mr. President, that is not the issue concerning which we are contending. My colleague did not attempt to say that President McKinley ever would have endorsed a proposal to have trade agreements which are properly the concern of both Houses of Congress enacted without their consent in each individual instance. If ever there was a President who was fully devoted to the Constitution of the United States and our accepted form of American government it was William McKinley. Surely he would not have given his consent to the administrative enactment of trade treaties without the full knowledge and participation of Congress.

I also desire to have printed in the RECORD a statement from the department of commerce at Harrisburg, Pa., with reference to the imports which have entered into competition with our workers in Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
Harrisburg, March 29, 1940.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR DAVIS: In accordance with your telephone conversation with Mr. Brown this afternoon, he has asked me to send you the following facts regarding the negative effects of reciprocal-trade agreements on Pennsylvania.

Steel: The total amount of steel products, including bars, rods, ingots, billets, sheets, pipes, tubes, wire, and strips—all Pennsylvania products—admitted in 1937, under trade-agreement rates, from Sweden, was 46,218,309 pounds.

From Belgium, in that same year, and omitting minor items, 36,857,777 pounds of steel and iron products were admitted under trade-agreement rates.

The total from these two nations of steel and steel products admitted into the United States at reduced tariff rates was 83,076,082 pounds of steel products competitive to United States steel manufactures.

In 1937, this same year, the United States census of unemployment reported 37,597 iron and steel workers in Pennsylvania as totally unemployed and 54,432 as partially unemployed; and the 1937 unemployment census was shown by later samplings to be a considerable understatement of the unemployment of that year.

In addition to this major Pennsylvania industry, the following facts will be of interest.

Under reciprocal-trade agreements, the duty on lime was reduced from 7 to 5 cents a hundred pounds; on Portland cement from 6 to 4½ cents; on glass sand from $2 a ton to $1 a ton; on glassware, including bottles and jars, from 75 percent to 37½ percent; on glass tableware and kitchen utensils from 60 to 30 percent; on plate glass from a range of 12½ to 17½ percent to a range of 8.3 to 11.7 percent.

In 1939, by agreement with Great Britain, the duty on electrical apparatus of various types was reduced from 35 to 25 percent, and this reduction will affect all other favored nations. On X-ray apparatus the reduction was from 35 to 17½ percent.

The duty on apples was reduced from 25 cents a bushel to 15 cents a bushel, and by agreement with Canada, sulphuric acid, in which product Pennsylvania leads the United States, was put on the free list.

In the matter of anthracite coal, while Russia, on account of internal difficulties on the Continent, has not been able to supply the 400,000 tons she thought she could produce, the intent of the agreement made by the Secretary of State was to admit that much coal into our country duty free.

I hope these additional facts will be helpful to you.

Sincerely yours,

RAYMOND H. SMITH,
Assistant Director, State Planning Board.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, in conclusion I wish to say that there has never been a time when a political use of the tariff has not brought its inevitable reaction. When the Democratic Party has tinkered with the tariff, tariff for revenue only, there have been results unfavorable to that party, and when Republicans have overstretched their bow, there have been political casualties. If, now, this shall become a sharply defined partisan issue, I feel confident that, next to the cause of peace, this question will bring to the Republican Party its largest measure of support. In my campaign for reelection in 1938, I strongly stated my determination to uphold protection for workers, farmers, and businessmen from unfair cutthroat competition from abroad, and I attribute the decisive results of that election in no small measure to the stand which I took on that issue, for I am thoroughly convinced that the citizens of my State and my fellow countrymen throughout the Nation are unalterably committed to the proposition that the rights of Americans shall not be unfairly and carelessly sacrificed on the false altar of international greed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment I proposed on March 26 be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert the following new section at the proper place:

SEC. —. (a) No foreign-trade agreement hereafter entered into under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, and no modification hereafter made in any such foreign-trade agreement, shall provide for a rate of duty on sugar imported from any foreign country which will be lower during any period than the rate applicable on September 1, 1934, to sugar imported from such foreign country, unless during such period (1) the quantity of imported sugar which may be marketed annually in the United States is by act of Congress restricted to a quantity no greater than the quantity of imported sugar which may be marketed annually under the provisions of the Sugar Act of 1937, and (2) benefits for domestic producers of sugar are provided which are substantially equivalent to those provided for in the Sugar Act of 1937.

(b) As used in this section, the term "sugar" includes any article to which the provisions of paragraph 501 of the Tariff Act of 1930 were applicable.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I desire to preface my remarks on this amendment by assuring Senators that the pending amendment is not related to, and is not in any manner connected with, the amendment that I presented to the Senate about 2 weeks ago in connection with the agricultural appropriation bill.

I am of the firm belief that this amendment is entitled to special attention by the Congress. Sugar has always been the subject of special legislation because of its involvement in national, international, and insular policy. I desire to point out to the Senate at this time a few salient facts in the history of sugar legislation in our country.

As Senators are aware, rates of import duty on sugar have been provided in all tariff acts. In 1876 Hawaiian sugar was admitted to the United States free of tariff duty. In 1890 a bounty on domestic production of sugar at the rate of 2 cents per pound replaced the tariff duty, but this provision was replaced in 1894 by an ad valorem tariff. In 1899 Hawaii and Puerto Rico were annexed as part of the United States.

In 1900 Puerto Rican sugar was admitted at an 85-percent reduction, and in 1901 it was admitted free of duty.

In 1902 the tariff on Philippine sugar was reduced 25 percent; then in 1903 the tariff on all Cuban sugar was reduced 20 percent under a reciprocal preferential agreement with Cuba. In 1909 Philippine sugar was admitted free of duty, but the amount limited to 300,000 tons; in 1913 all Philippine sugar was admitted free, with provision for placing sugar on the free list effective May 1, 1916.

On April 27, 1916, the free-sugar clause of the Underwood Tariff Act was repealed.

In 1933 Congress passed the Philippine Independence Act, which limited to 850,000 long tons the amount of Philippine sugar which can be entered free of duty. Also in 1933 the Department of Agriculture invited the domestic areas to submit a plan for stabilization of the sugar market, but the stabilization agreement drafted by the sugar industry was rejected by the Secretary of Agriculture. In 1934 the President requested Congress to make sugar beets and sugarcane basic agricultural commodities and to provide a quota system, which became law under the Jones-Costigan Act. Also in 1934 the tariff on Cuban sugar was reduced by Presidential proclamation under the flexible-tariff provisions to 1.50 cents per pound and all other foreign sugars to 1.875 cents per pound.

After the Jones-Costigan Act became law the Cuban trade agreement went into effect, providing for a further reduction in tariff from 1.50 cents to 0.90 cent per pound on Cuban sugar.

In 1936 the United States Supreme Court invalidated processing taxes and benefit payments, but the sugar-quota system remained in effect. In 1937 Congress passed the Sugar Act, restoring processing taxes, conditional payments, and establishing a new basis for quotas. Later in 1937 the United States Senate ratified the international sugar agreement, which does not affect domestic sugar areas but contains provisions in connection with Cuba, the Philippines, and the import of other foreign sugars into the United States.

The amendment I have proposed to the pending resolution merely provides that, so long as there is sugar legislation on our statute books, a trade agreement may be entered into between our State Department and foreign nations with respect to lowering the tariff on sugar. But in the event there is no sugar legislation, then the Department is barred from negotiating any trade agreement looking toward the lowering of the tariff on that commodity. It must be remembered that the present Sugar Act is not dependent upon the existence of a tariff. The Sugar Act sets up a system of quotas, whereby the amount of sugar which is permitted to enter and that which is produced in this country is to be equal to the amount of sugar which we consume, with allowances made, of course, for normal carry-overs and abnormal and emergency conditions. In other words, the philosophy of the quota system is based on the theory that the amount of sugar we are permitted to produce in this country, plus the sugar which is allowed to be sent in by our insular possessions, plus what we purchase from Cuba and the Philippines, and also from other foreign nations, under certain restrictions, will supply us with sufficient sugar to meet our domestic consumptive requirements. And by prorating our sugar market among the various sugar-producing areas and possessions and countries, the price of sugar in the United States will remain stable, and both producer and consumer will benefit. This system of quota regulation will expire on December 31, 1940, unless new legislation is enacted.

As I have previously stated, the amendment I am offering merely provides that should there not be a sugar bill enacted after the present law expires, then the tariff which now exists on sugar cannot be lowered by the State Department. I will read the amendment, and I will point out to the Senate the rate of tariff provided in the amendment, as well as the amount of sugar that is to be imported under the amendment. I read from the amendment:

No foreign-trade agreement hereafter entered into under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, and no modification hereafter made in any such foreign-trade agreement, shall provide for a rate of duty on sugar imported from any foreign country which will be lower during any period than the rate applicable on September 1, 1934—

The rate on that date was $1.50 on Cuban sugars and $1.87½ on all other foreign sugars.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. And that rate was established by proclamation by the President, setting forth that it protected the cost of production in this country as against the cost of production in Cuba and other countries.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct. I read further from the amendment—to sugar imported from such foreign country, unless during such period (1) the quantity of imported sugar which may be marketed annually in the United States is by act of Congress restricted to a quantity no greater than the quantity of imported sugar which may be marketed annually under the provisions of the Sugar Act of 1937, and—

Now, let me read the provision of the 1937 Sugar Act with reference to continental production and importations from our insular possessions. Section 202 of the act provides, in part:

SEC. 202. Whenever a determination is made, pursuant to section 201, of the amount of sugar needed to meet the requirements of consumers, the Secretary shall establish quotas or revise existing quotas—

(a) For domestic sugar-producing areas by prorating among such areas 55.59 percent of such amount of sugar (but not less than 3,715,000 short tons) on the following basis:

Area:	Percent
Domestic beet sugar	41.72
Mainland cane sugar	11.31
Hawaii	25.25
Puerto Rico	21.48
Virgin Islands	.24

The important provision of the 1937 Sugar Act, insofar as my pending amendment is concerned, is section 202 (b), which reads as follows:

(b) For foreign countries and the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, by prorating 44.41 percent of such amount of sugar (except if such amount of sugar is less than 6,682,670 short tons, the excess of such amount over 3,715,000 short tons) on the following basis:

Area:	Percent
Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands	34.70
Cuba	64.41
Foreign countries other than Cuba	.89

As I have pointed out to the Senate a few minutes ago, the pending amendment provides that the importation of sugar shall be no greater than the quantity that is provided for in the present sugar law; and in addition thereto, the amendment carries this further condition—

(2) benefits for domestic producers of sugar are provided which are substantially equivalent to those provided for in the Sugar Act of 1937.

Mr. President, I believe that the amendment is very plain, and really speaks for itself; I do not feel that the subject requires any further discussion. I hope Senators will vote for its adoption. It vitally affects the constituents of every Senator in whose State sugar is produced, because I am satisfied that if there is no sugar law enacted at this session of Congress, and if trade agreements should be entered into whereby the present sugar tariff were reduced one iota from its present rate, that action would mean the death knell to sugar production in this country. Thousands of American farmers and agricultural workers are involved. Therefore I urge the Senate to adopt my amendment. It is a worthwhile and constructive amendment.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Davis	Johnson, Calif.	Reed
Ashurst	Donahey	Johnson, Colo.	Reynolds

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, has the Senator from Louisiana concluded?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes. I have asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely desire to say, before the vote is taken, that I understand that next week legislation will be begun in the House dealing with the quota basis for sugar, and we look for such a measure to come to the Senate. As I stated when a question affecting sugar was before us, those interested in sugar will have our cooperation in the effort to secure the passage of that legislation before the adjournment of Congress.

In view of all the circumstances, I hope the amendment will be defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I am not informed as to how he would vote on this question. Therefore I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRIDGES (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. BILBO. On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS]. If he were present, he would vote "yea"; if I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], the Senators from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS and Mr. SLATTERY], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMATHERS], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] are detained from the Senate on important public business.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are unavoidably detained.

I announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL]; and

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN].

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the following pairs on this question:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY];

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS]; and

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMATHERS].

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—21

Adams	Holman	O'Mahoney	Thomas, Idaho
Bulow	Johnson, Calif.	Overton	Vandenberg
Clark, Idaho	Johnson, Colo.	Pepper	Wiley

So Mr. ELLENDER'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I call up an amendment which is on the desk, and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to add the following new section:

> Any foreign trade agreement heretofore entered into under such section 350 which is applicable with respect to manganese ore shall be terminated at the earliest date possible in accordance with the terms of such agreement, with a view toward modifying or renewing such agreement in such a manner that the duties and other import restrictions applicable with respect to manganese ore will be those specifically provided for in title I of the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, there was considerable confusion in the Chamber at the time the amendment was read. I do not believe all Senators heard it.

I made some remarks on manganese a week ago today. At this time I wish briefly to call attention to the fact that manganese ore is the number one strategic critical mineral for our national defense; so, I wish Senators would sincerely consider the amendment, because it is so manifestly necessary for our national defense. I say it is necessary, because if the sea lanes are not kept open we must have manganese on hand in this country; and that means domestic development, which cannot start too soon.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GURNEY. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I should like to inquire as to the possibilities of production of manganese in this country. Can the Senator briefly give us some idea of the possibilities?

Mr. GURNEY. As to the resources in this country?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Yes. I understand that in the State of South Dakota there are vast quantities of manganese ore, perhaps not of the highest quality, but ore from which manganese can be produced under favorable circumstances.

Mr. GURNEY. I thank the Senator. The surveys by the Bureau of Mines show that manganese ore is available in a number of States in the Union. In my State the surveys show 100,000,000 tons, which is sufficient for 100 years if we can start developing it.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be rejected. The fact is that manganese production in this country is only about 5 percent of the consumptive demand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY]. On this amendment the yeas and nays have been demanded and ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRIDGES (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I am not informed how he would vote on this question. I therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], the Senators from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS and Mr. SLATTERY], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMATHERS], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] are detained from the Senate on important public business.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are unavoidably detained.

The Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL]. I am advised that if present and voting the Senator from California would vote "yea," and the Senator from Georgia would vote "nay."

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] has a general pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN].

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the following pairs on this question:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], who would vote "yea," with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY], who would vote "nay."

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who would vote "yea," with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], who would vote "nay."

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], who would vote "yea," with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMATHERS], who would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 47, as follow:

YEAS—31

Ashurst	Ellender	King	Reed
Austin	Frazier	Lodge	Taft

So Mr. GURNEY's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is before the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment proposed——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I wish to make a very brief statement.

As a member of the Finance Committee I voted to report the joint resolution when it was before the committee. I reserved, however, the right to vote as I chose on certain amendments to be offered on the floor of the Senate.

I am now about to cast my vote in favor of the joint resolution notwithstanding my disappointment that the Senate has been unwilling either to shorten the term of the authority so that Congress might consider changes and modifications to meet certain objections made by Members of the Senate, or to make the agreements subject to majority approval of the Senate and House, both of which proposals, as all Senators know, I have earnestly and vigorously urged.

However, I am unwilling to vote against the joint resolution, because I think it is a good fundamental and basic principle for a foreign trade program, including the fixing of quotas and removal of vicious tariff barriers which some countries have set up, and concerning which negotiations cannot be entered into by the Congress. I believe that negotiating with foreign countries for trade agreements should not be completely scuttled. Inasmuch as I favor the basic principle and because I am unwilling to take a course which would be construed as one of censure of the entire reciprocal trade agreements program I shall vote for the joint resolution. I shall, however, continue to seek in the future, as I have during this debate, certain modifications, including provision for concurrent action by the Congress, and broader opportunities for hearings and action under the so-called escape clause.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I desire to make just a brief observation before the vote is taken.

During the past few days I have received a few letters making inquiry as to why my statement on this measure was delayed until after the vote on the Pittman amendment. To make the RECORD clear to those persons who are interested, I should like to have the RECORD show that I did try to gain recognition for an entire day before the Pittman amendment was acted on. I had advised the leaders and the Chair of my desire to secure recognition, and had been assured by the leaders that I would obtain recognition before the Pittman amendment was voted upon, but could not gain recognition or the floor until immediately thereafter. I did, of course, vote for the Pittman amendment, and shall, as I have heretofore stated, vote "no" on the joint resolution.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to insert a new section, to read as follows:

SEC. —. (a) Section 205 of the Public Salary Tax Act of 1939 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 205. No amount of income tax (including interest, additions to tax, and additional amounts) shall be collected after the date of enactment of this act for any taxable year beginning prior to January 1, 1939, to the extent attributable to compensation for personal services as an officer or employee of a State, or any political subdivision thereof, or any agency or instrumentality of any one or more of the foregoing. As used in this section the term 'compensation' means compensation paid directly or indirectly by the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof."

(b) This section shall take effect as of April 12, 1939.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I realize that ordinarily this amendment would have no place on the joint resolution before the Senate, but as this matter relates to revenue I ask the attention of the Senate for just a few moments.

Some days ago I had printed an amendment on this subject, which I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD at this point as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the joint resolution insert the following new section:

"SEC. —. (a) Section 205 of the Public Salary Tax Act of 1939 is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 205. Any amount of income tax (including interests, additions to tax, and additional amounts) collected on, before, or after the date of enactment of this act for any taxable year beginning prior to January 1, 1939, to the extent attributable to compensation for personal services as an officer or employee of a State, or any political subdivision thereof, or any agency or instrumentality of any one or more of the foregoing, shall be credited or refunded in the same manner as in the case of an income tax erroneously collected, if claim for refund with respect thereto is filed prior to January 1, 1941. As used in this section, the term "compensation" means compensation paid directly or indirectly by the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof and compensation received in the form of fees or other charges authorized by State law.'

"(b) This section shall take effect as of April 12, 1939."

Mr. WILEY. Today I received for the first time an opinion from the Department in reference to this amendment, which was adverse. I ask to have it printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The opinion is as follows:

MARCH 29, 1940.

HON. PAT HARRISON,
Chairman, Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Reference is made to your letter of March 15, 1940, requesting a report on an amendment intended to be proposed by Senator WILEY, of Wisconsin, to House Joint Resolution 407 (extension of Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act). The proposed provision would amend section 205 of the Public Salary Tax Act of 1939 to compel the refund of all taxes for taxable years beginning prior to January 1, 1939, collected on, before, or after the date of the enactment of such act upon the compensation of State officers and employees paid directly or indirectly by the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof or received in the form of fees or other charges authorized by State law, if a claim for refund with respect thereto is filed prior to January 1, 1941.

The proposed amendment is unnecessary, insofar as it extends to officers and employees whose compensation is received in the form of fees or other charges authorized by State law the same relief which is at present afforded State officers and employees under the Public Salary Tax Act with respect to compensation received directly from the State or a political subdivision thereof. The term "compensation" as used in the Public Salary Tax Act in its present form includes such compensation and has been so interpreted by the Bureau of Internal Revenue. See Mimeograph 4916, C. B. 1939–1, 71, 74; and T. D. 4904, C. B. 1939–1, 399, 401 (copies attached). The proposed amendment, however, goes further than a mere reaffirmation of the rights such employees enjoy under the Public Salary Tax Act of 1939. By removing the restrictions contained in that act as to the time when claim for refund must have been filed it treats such employees more favorably than employees who receive their compensation directly from the State itself. No justification for such favoritism is apparent.

Insofar as the proposed amendment grants refunds to State officers and employees whose compensation was paid directly or indirectly by the Federal Government, it conflicts with the entire rationale of title II of the Public Salary Tax Act. Such title was designed to avoid retroactive taxation of the compensation of State and local government officers and employees in cases where at the time such compensation was earned it was thought to be exempt, but which, because of Helvering v. Gerhardt (304 U. S. 405 (1938)), was found to be taxable. (See H. R. Rept. No. 26, 76th Cong., 1st sess. (1939) 5; S. Rept. No. 112, 76th Cong., 1st sess. (1939) 12.) The specific exclusion from relief of compensation paid directly or indirectly by the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof was, therefore, entirely in accord with the rationale of the enactment as a whole. Notwithstanding prior regulations, beginning with Regulations 86, issued under the Revenue Act of 1934, the Bureau took the position that such compensation was taxable. The last paragraph of article 116–2, Regulations 86, as originally issued read as follows:

"If all or part of the compensation of an officer or employee of a State or political subdivision thereof is paid directly or indirectly by the United States, such compensation (or part) is taxable, as, for example, any compensation paid by the United States to officers of the National Guard of a State, or compensation paid by a State to officers or employees of an agricultural school or college wholly or partly out of grants from the United States."

This position has been sustained in the case of Hanson v. Landy (24 F. Supp. 535 (D. Minn., 1938)). In 1935 such rule was expressly made applicable to the officers and employees of State emergency relief administrations, directly or indirectly paid from funds granted to the State by the Federal Government. (See I. T. 2859, C. B. XIV–1, 101 (1935), copy attached.)

An amendment similar to that now proposed relative to compensation paid by the United States was offered when the Public Salary Tax Act was before the House, and was rejected (84 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 1330–1331 (1939)). At that time Mr. MCCORMACK presented the following objections to its adoption (p. 1331):

"Mr. Chairman, the amendment just offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLAR] was considered by the Committee on Ways and Means. The section he undertakes to strike out includes certain employees who have always been subject to a Federal income tax in the main. It is a case where an employee of the State is being paid out of the funds of the Federal Government. They have always been subject to the Federal income-tax law, and we simply provide that the retroactive features of this title shall not apply to them."

In the opinion of this Department, such statement is still a complete answer to any proposal of the character here being considered.

There was sound precedent for the position taken in the Public Salary Tax Act relative to compensation paid directly or indirectly by the United States. The same position had previously been taken in section 1211 of the Revenue Act of 1926, relative to liability arising under the Revenue Act of 1924 and prior revenue acts. Such section was in the following form:

"Any taxes imposed by the Revenue Act of 1924 or prior revenue acts upon any individual in respect of amounts received by him as compensation for personal services as an officer or employee of any State or political subdivision thereof (except to the extent that such compensation is paid by the United States Government directly or indirectly), shall, subject to the statutory period of limitations properly applicable thereto, be abated, credited, or refunded."

Such language serves in addition to demonstrate that Congress has always considered such compensation to be taxable. A line was also drawn between locally paid and federally paid compensation in section 116 (b) of the revenue acts beginning with that of 1928 to and including the Internal Revenue Code prior to its amendment. Such section exempted—

"In the case of an individual employed by Alaska or Hawaii or any political subdivision thereof as a teacher in any educational institution, the compensation received as such. This subsection shall not exempt compensation paid directly or indirectly by the Government of the United States."

It is to be observed that taxpayers, under existing legislation, are not prevented from presenting, in a particular case, the question whether the compensation received by them as State officers or employees is in fact and in law paid directly or indirectly by the Federal Government.

Apart from its general objections to granting refunds to this class of taxpayers, the Treasury opposes the amendment in its present form on the ground that it would place such taxpayers in a better position than those already covered by the act, in that (1) it removes the bar of the statute of limitations, which was not done by the Public Salary Tax Act, and (2) none of the restrictions applicable to other taxpayers under the Public Salary Tax Act with respect to the time within which a claim for refund must have been filed will be applicable to State officers and employees whose compensation is paid directly or indirectly by the United States. Under the amendment as drafted, refunds would be required of taxes collected prior to 1925, and the amendment would in effect repeal the exception contained in section 1211 of the Revenue Act of 1926, already quoted.

For the foregoing reasons, the Treasury is not in favor of the proposed amendment.

In the event of further correspondence, please refer to symbols IR:GC:L&R:CRP; A–342367.

The Director, Bureau of the Budget, has advised the Treasury Department that there is no objection to the presentation of this report.

Very truly yours,

JOHN L. SULLIVAN,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WILEY. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] kindly had the representatives of the Department go over the matter; and, as a result, there came out of the consultation the modified amendment which I have submitted to the Senate.

I ask to have incorporated in my remarks, at this point, the act passed by the Seventy-sixth Congress (Public, No. 32, 76th Cong., 1st sess., H. R. 3790), which my amendment seeks to amend.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, is is so ordered.

The act is as follows:

[Public, No. 32—76th Cong.—ch. 59, 1st sess.—H. R. 3790]

An act relating to the taxation of the compensation of public officers and employees

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Public Salary Tax Act of 1939."

TITLE I

SECTION 1. Section 22 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to the definition of "gross income") is amended by inserting after the words "compensation for personal service" the following: ("including personal service as an officer or employee of a State, or any political subdivision thereof, or any agency or instrumentality of any one or more of the foregoing").

SEC. 2. Section 116 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code (exempting compensation of teachers in Alaska and Hawaii from income tax) is repealed.

SEC. 3. Section 22 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence to read as follows: "In the case of judges of courts of the United States who took office on or before June 6, 1932, the compensation received as such shall be included in gross income."

SEC. 4. The United States hereby consents to the taxation of compensation, received after December 31, 1938, for personal service as an officer or employee of the United States, any Territory or possession or political subdivision thereof, the District of Columbia, or any agency or instrumentality of any one or more of the foregoing, by any duly constituted taxing authority having jurisdiction to tax such compensation, if such taxation does not discriminate against such officer or employee because of the source of such compensation.

TITLE II

SEC. 201. Any amount of income tax (including interest, additions to tax, and additional amounts) for any taxable year beginning prior to January 1, 1938, to the extent attributable to compensation for personal service as an officer or employee of a State, or any political subdivision thereof, or any agency or instrumentality of any one or more of the foregoing—

(a) Shall not be assessed, and no proceeding in court for the collection thereof shall be begun or prosecuted (unless pursuant to an assessment made prior to January 1, 1939);

(b) If assessed after December 31, 1938, the assessment shall be abated, and any amount collected in pursuance of such assessment shall be credited or refunded in the same manner as in the case of an income tax erroneously collected; and

(c) Shall, if collected on or before the date of the enactment of this act, be credited or refunded in the same manner as in the case of an income tax erroneously collected, in the following cases—

(1) Where a claim for refund of such amount was filed before January 19, 1939, and was not disallowed on or before the date of the enactment of this act;

(2) Where such claim was so filed but has been disallowed and the time for beginning suit with respect thereto has not expired on the date of the enactment of this act;

(3) Where a suit for the recovery of such amount is pending on the date of the enactment of this act; and

(4) Where a petition to the Board of Tax Appeals has been filed with respect to such amount and the Board's decision has not become final before the date of the enactment of this act.

SEC. 202. In the case of any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1937, and before January 1, 1939, compensation for personal service as an officer or employee of a State, or any political subdivision thereof, or any agency or instrumentality of any one or more of the foregoing, shall not be included in the gross income of any individual under title I of the Revenue Act of 1938 and shall be exempt from taxation under such title, if such individual either—

(a) Did not include in his return for a taxable year beginning after December 31, 1936, and before January 1, 1938, any amount as compensation for personal service as an officer or employee of a State, or any political subdivision thereof, or any agency or instrumentality of any one or more of the foregoing; or

(b) Did include any such amount in such return, but is entitled under section 201 of this act to have the tax attributable thereto credited or refunded.

SEC. 203. Any amount of income tax (including interest, additions to tax, and additional amounts) collected on, before, or after the date of the enactment of this act for any taxable year beginning prior to January 1, 1939, to the extent attributable to compensation for personal service as an officer or employee of a State, or any political subdivision thereof, or any agency or instrumentality of any one or more of the foregoing, shall be credited or refunded in the same manner as in the case of an income tax erroneously collected, if claim for refund with respect thereto is filed after January 18, 1939, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under regulations prescribed by him, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, finds that disallowance of such claim would result in the application of the doctrines in the cases of Helvering v. Therrell (303 U. S. 218), Helvering v. Gerhart (304 U. S. 405), and Graves et al. v. New York ex rel. O'Keefe, decided March 27, 1939, extending the classes of officers and employees subject to Federal taxation.

SEC. 204. Neither section 201 nor section 203 shall apply in any case where the claim for refund, or the institution of the suit, or the filing of the petition with the Board, was, at the time filed or begun, barred by the statute of limitations properly applicable thereto.

SEC. 205. Compensation shall not be considered as compensation within the meaning of sections 201, 202, and 203 to the extent that it is paid directly or indirectly by the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof.

SEC. 206. The terms used in this act shall have the same meaning as when used in chapter I of the Internal Revenue Code.

SEC. 207. No collection of any tax (including interest, additions to tax, and penalties) imposed by any State, Territory, possession, or local taxing authority on the compensation, received before January 1, 1939, for personal service as an officer or employee of the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof which is exempt from Federal income taxation and, if a corporate agency or instrumentality, is one (a) a majority of the stock of which is owned by or on behalf of the United States, or (b) the power to appoint or select a majority of the board of directors of which is exercisable by or on behalf of the United States, shall be made after the date of the enactment of this act.

SEC. 208. This title shall not apply with respect to any officer or employee of a State, or any political subdivision thereof, or any agency or instrumentality of any one or more of the foregoing, after the Secretary of the Treasury has determined and proclaimed that it is the policy of such State to collect from any individual any tax, interest, additions to tax, or penalties, on account of compensation received by such individual prior to January 1, 1939, for personal service as an officer or employee of the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof. In making such determination the Secretary of the Treasury shall disregard the taxation of officers and employees of any corporate agency or instrumentality which is not exempt from Federal income taxation, or which if so exempt is one (a) a majority of the stock of which is not owned by or on behalf of the United States and (b) the power to appoint or select a majority of the board of directors of which is not exercisable by or on behalf of the United States.

SEC. 209. In the case of the Judges of the Supreme Court, and of the inferior courts of the United States created under article III of the Constitution, who took office on or before June 6, 1932, the compensation received as such shall not be subject to income tax under the Revenue Act of 1938 or any prior revenue act.

SEC. 210. For the purposes of this act, the term "officer or employee" includes a member of a legislative body and a judge or officer of a court.

SEC. 211. If either title of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, is held invalid, the other title of the act shall not be affected thereby.

Approved, April 12, 1939.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, my amendment proposes to insert a new section 205 in the Public Salary Tax Act of 1939. The Industrial Commission of Wisconsin has directed my attention to what it believes is a gross injustice now worked on certain State employees by the Public Salary Tax Act of 1939.

Briefly, the present Supreme Court of the United States found no constitutional limitations on the power of the Federal Government to tax State employees, and vice versa. Accordingly, the 1939 Public Salary Tax Act provided that the Federal Government would not seek to collect back taxes from State employees, which it was at liberty to do under the new interpretation. The act made one exception. That exception was the group of State employees whose salaries had been financed in whole or in part out of Federal grants. This is outlined in section 205 of the Public Salary Act.

This appears to be an unreasonable and arbitrary classification, and may work a serious injustice. This may mean that many State employees will now be called upon to make up, in one lump payment, the tax for some years back, and for a period during which they may have been immune from taxation under a court interpretation. These State employees were in the same service classification and the same salary bracket as other State employees with salary not financed by Federal grants, and a good many of them were in service before the Federal grant of funds.

Let us briefly consider this matter under two headings:

First. Number of employees affected.

Second. Considerations relating to the equities of the situation.

1. Number of employees affected: Conservatively, there are several hundred State employees in Wisconsin whose interests are, in all probability, affected by the present Federal legislation allowing assessments for past years on their income earned in State service. At this time an approximately exact number cannot be stated. However, an enumeration of the departments affected will show the wide application of the principle at stake. The employment service and the unemployment compensation department of the industrial commission have approximately 600 employees. While, of course, not all of these fall in salary brackets that would cause them to be affected by the present income-tax legislation, nevertheless there is a good proportion of this number who are affected.

The chairman of the highway commission estimates that there are approximately 200 individuals in the State highway department who may well have to pay back taxes through a considerable number of years. Many individuals on the instructional staff at the university, in the schools of engineering and of agriculture, are affected. The entire number of county agents and their staffs are concerned. The department of agriculture and markets have some cases involved. The department of public welfare, embodying the relief and assistance agencies, have a very considerable number of individuals affected. The employees of the department of vocational education have a stake in the matter. Employees in the department of public instruction and in the conservation department are affected.

2. Considerations relating to the equities of the situation: In all save a very few cases, such as university instructors and county agents, the State employees whose salaries are derived in whole or in part from Federal grants to the State have come from the classified civil-service lists. There is absolutely no difference in job-qualification standards and general nature of work done between employees whose salaries are traceable to Federal grants and employees whose salaries are not so traceable. State employees, regardless of whether or not their income is derived from Federal grants, not only are selected with reference to identical job-qualifications standards and do the same type of work, the civil-service classification considered, but there is likewise no difference in the salary brackets; and promotions, pay increases, and so forth, are subject to identical considerations.

Illustrative of this point, there are several situations I have learned of, wherein the employees whose salaries have been derived in the past from Federal grants were without knowledge of the fact. It is not at all unusual for employees in the State service to be unacquainted with fiscal arrangements existing between the State and the Federal Government.

In a number of instances the State employees affected in the instant situation were already in State employment and performing the functions of their departments before the advent of Federal funds into the picture. As an example, the State of Wisconsin had an employment service and an unemployment-compensation department before the Wagner-Peyser funds and funds under title III of the Social Security Act were made available, respectively, to these two departments. The affected employees in these two departments had been selected with reference to personnel classifications set up before the coming in of Federal funds. Their qualifications and salary classifications in no manner related to Federal specifications. At the time Federal funds were afforded the State, there was no change in pay or salary classification of these individuals. It is quite obvious that if the Federal Government now goes back and taxes these employees, the fact that the Federal Government came in and furnished money to the State to pay the salaries of these employees means that these employees suffered what amounts to a salary waiver which is now to be made effective by one assessment for all these past years. The employees in those departments have in very many instances been selected from classifications in the civil-service list from which many other State departments draw their personnel, and hence are receiving the same rates of pay and are performing the same functions as are other State employees. Certainly to go back now and tax this restricted group of individuals on a retroactive base makes for discrimination and inequality between employees in the State doing the same type of work pursuant to State civil-service standards.

Therefore, I am offering my amendment to correct this situation. Title 2 of the Public Salary Tax Act of 1939 affords relief to certain State officers and employees from Federal income taxes for years prior to 1939. The relief so afforded did not include State offcers and employees who were paid directly or indirectly by the United States, because the Treasury Department argued that they were always subject to the tax, and it would have been inequitable to afford them such relief.

Section 205 of the present law prevents relief where the compensation is paid directly or indirectly by the United States. My amendment, as modified, repeals the present section 205 by amending it to read in a different manner.

The effect of my amendment, as modified, is to prevent the collection of taxes for all taxable years prior to 1939 if the compensation was paid directly or indirectly by the United States. It does not apply to the ordinary State officer or employee, nor to the employee engaged in an essential governmental function, as distinguished from one engaged in a nonessential function. The test to be applied is whether the compensation was paid by the United States. No money would be paid out of the Treasury as a result of adopting this amendment, as it does not authorize any refunds of taxes already paid.

No one can say that this amendment applies only to a Wisconsin baby. We have heard arguments here throughout 2 weeks to the effect that every State has a child of its own. Each Senator is interested in this matter. In my State there are from 500 to 700 public officials who will be penalized. In States such as New York the number will run up to from 3,000 to 10,000. If the Government imposes and collects this tax, as it threatens to do, it will reach back 6 years, and take the salary that the individual earns this year.

I have here a letter, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD, from a very prominent professor in Wisconsin University. By his personal efforts, because of his discovery of vitamins and their effect, he has given the equivalent of millions of dollars to the public good. He calls attention to the fact that because the Government has contributed something toward the salaries of professors in the University, his associate professors will have to pay back income taxes to the Government throughout the years.

I ask that this letter be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN,
COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE,
Madison, Wis., April 1, 1940.

Hon. Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: It has lately been called to my attention that due to a reversal of a previous Supreme Court decision, State employees like myself will be subject to the payment of a Federal income tax on that part of our salary which for some years has been exempt because of its origin from the State treasury.

I, of course, can raise no valid objection against the payment of taxes upon income because in most instances I am convinced that income tax is a justifiable tax. But in my own particular case and in that of many of my colleagues it so happens that we received payment over a long period of years without knowing whether the money for these payments had its origin from State or Federal sources. In some cases the payments were made primarily from State sources and in other cases primarily from Federal sources. But of this we were never notified. In consequence of this if we would now have to make payment of these back taxes some of us would be affected very little and others would be affected to a critical extent. It is this injustice which prompts me to write you hoping that you will do everything you can to secure the enactment of a law which will remove the liability for these back taxes.

Thanking you, I am
Cordially yours,

HARRY STEENBOCK.

Mr. WILEY. I also ask to have incorporated in the RECORD a statement from the Industrial Commission of the State of Wisconsin, by its counsel, Stanley Rector.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

INEQUITABLE TREATMENT OF CERTAIN STATE EMPLOYEES IN THE 1939 PUBLIC SALARY TAX ACT

The 1939 Public Salary Tax Act abated the liability of State officers and employees to pay Federal income taxes on their earnings for past years, except to the extent that their compensation had been paid directly or indirectly by the Federal Government.

This analysis proposes to show that the failure to extend exemption from past liability to the class of State employees indicated above is out of accord with what Congress had in mind at the time of the passage of the act, and is premised on an erroneous understanding of the past history of the problem of Federal taxation of State employees.

It is generally regarded that the Federal Supreme Court in Helvering v. Gerhardt (304 U. S. 405 (1938)) and in Graves v. O'Keefe (59 S. Ct. 595 (1939)) has greatly restricted (if it did not, for all practical purposes, destroy) the constitutional immunities from taxation which had formerly attached to State and Federal employees. The Supreme Court in these cases decided that the constitutional immunity from taxation that had been previously supposed to exist as to a great number of State and Federal employees had never as a fact existed. As a consequence these employees became apparently liable to pay income taxes on all their past earnings—that is, State employees became liable to pay Federal income taxes on all their past earnings and Federal employees became liable to pay State income taxes on all their past earnings. An obviously intolerable situation would have existed had not remedial action been taken. The Public Salary Tax Act of 1939 proposed to rectify the matter by waiving and abating past income-tax liability which had thus been acquired by State and Federal employees by reason of the cited Supreme Court decisions. While this remedial legislation was being discussed by Congress, representatives of the Treasury Department proposed that past liability be abated as to all State employees except those who had no legal basis for believing their compensation to be exempt. This was in accord with the President's message of January 19, 1939, which specified the need of protection because of recent Supreme Court decisions for individuals who "mistakenly and in good faith" had believed their compensation to be immune from Federal tax.

John P. Wenchel, Chief Counsel, Bureau of Internal Revenue, stated to the House Committee on Ways and Means:

"The President's recomemndations with respect to excusing now from Federal income tax for past years the compensation of those employees of States and their municipalities who honestly had good reason to believe their compensation to be immune from tax can, in my opinion, be adopted satisfactorily without at the same time excusing from tax liability those employees who have had no legal basis for believing their compensation to be exempt. For example, even before the Gerhardt decision State employees engaged in the sale of liquor on behalf of the State knew definitely they were subject to Federal income tax on their compensation (Ohio v. Helvering (1934), 292 U. S. 360); officers and employees of public utilities, such as State railways and the like, owned or operated by a State or municipality, knew their compensation was subject to Federal income tax (Helvering v. Powers (1934), 293 U. S. 214); and for 13 years it has been known that an independent contractor performing services for, or supplying materials to, a State or a political subdivision thereof is subject to Federal income tax (Metcalf & Eddy v. Mitchell (1926), 269 U. S. 514) on his compensation received therefor."

No proposed draft was before the congressional committee, and only the general content and specifications of proposed legislation were being recommended and considered. The provisions were to be later drawn by the Treasury Department. In view of all the discussion at the time of hearings on the measure, it can but be assumed that Congress intended to exclude from the abating provisions of the law only those State employees who in the past "had no legal basis for believing their compensation to be exempt."

It would appear, therefore, that those drafting the legislation considered that the class of State employees who could be properly regarded as having had reason to definitely know that they had always been subject to Federal income taxes were those State employees whose salaries had been paid directly or indirectly by the Federal Government.

In this thought there was fundamental error. It is this error relating to the class of employees who could be held as always having known that they were liable for Federal taxes that gives rise to the erroneous classification of section 205 of the 1939 Public Salary Tax Act which fails to abate the liability of State employees who have been paid in whole or in part, directly or indirectly, by the Federal Government. An examination of the state of law then obtaining will make clear that this classification made by section 205 is an erroneous one and that it visits liability for past taxes on a group of employees who as a class had no good reason whatsoever to know that they had any legal liability to pay Federal income taxes.

If the thesis set out immediately preceding can be successfully maintained, clearly Congress should in all fairness move to correct the situation which obviously has and will continue to work gross inequities and will affect in an intolerable manner the finances of a very large number of citizens. The following analysis will disclose the essential soundness of the thesis.

At the time of the passage of the Public Salary Tax Act there was, as a matter of fact, as pointed out by Mr. Wenchel (see above quotation from his testimony) a class of State employees who had full reason to know that they were subject to the Federal income tax. The cases cited by Mr. Wenchel are illustrative of the nature and limits of this classification. Nothing could be clearer than that the group who had reason to know of their liability under Federal income-tax legislation was made up of State employees whose income had been derived from services in the nonessential functions of State government or in the proprietary or group aspects of such governmental activity.

A converse analysis will, with equal clearness, show that the controlling cases and legislation defining the nature and limits of the class of employees who had full reason to know of their Federal tax liability were in no manner related to the item of the Federal payment of salaries. A chronology and summary of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States will clearly demonstrate the basis of the classification of federally taxable State employees and those State employees immune from Federal taxes that existed prior to the Supreme Court's decisions in the Gerhardt and O'Keefe cases.

In Dobbins v. Commissioners of Erie County (16 Peters 435 (1842)) and in Collector v. Day (11 Wall. 113 (1870)) the Court laid down the principles of the respective immunity of Federal and State employees from the taxing jurisdiction of the other sovereign. The immunity doctrine was based upon a conception of sovereignty that permitted no burdens to be imposed thereon on the theory that an allowance of the power to tax held in it the power to destroy.

In Flint v. Stone Tracy Company (220 U. S. 107, 172 (1911)) there was the first limitation on the broad doctrine of Federal and State employee immunity when certain trustees were held not to be agents of a State government in the sense which exempts them from taxation because of the execution of necessary governmental powers of the State.

In South Carolina v. United States (199 U. S. 437 (1905)) the immunity doctrine was restricted by the holding that immunity from taxation related only to governmental functions. The State in its proprietary capacity had established dispensaries for the exclusive sale of liquor, and the Court sustained the imposition of a Federal tax on such activity.

These previous cases occurred prior to the sixteenth amendment and could not, of course, have reference to the powers conferred by this amendment to the Federal Constitution. However, Evans v. Gore (253 U. S. 245 (1920)) held that the purpose of the sixteenth amendment was not to broaden the scope of taxation or bring in new subject matter for taxes, but was merely to relieve income taxes from the constitutional requirement that direct taxes must be apportioned between the States according to their respective populations.

In Metcalf & Eddy v. Mitchell (269 U. S. 514 (1926)) it was reiterated that performance of services in governmental functions was the test of immunity, and it was held that an independent contractor performing a contract relating to results was not in such relation to the State as to have Federal income-tax immunity conferred upon him.

Ohio v. Helvering (292 U. S. 360 (1934)) applied the doctrine of the South Carolina case to another State monopoly on liquor stores.

In New York ex rel. Rogers v. Graves (1937) (299 U. S. 401) the court, in applying the immunity doctrine, found that New York could not constitutionally tax the salaries paid the officers and employees of the Panama Railroad Co. The operation of the Canal was held to be an exercise of the war and commerce powers (p. 406), and without any question as to the distinguishing characteristics of an instrumentality of government as compared with employees engaged in the performance of services for such instrumentality, the court immediately concluded that the officers and employees of the railroad company were exempt from taxation.

In Brush v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue (300 U. S. 352 (1937)) the court concluded that water was a vital necessity to the city of New York and was auxiliary to its public functions, with the consequence that officers and employees of the city's water department were immune from Federal income taxation.

Allen v. Regents of the University System of Georgia (304 U. S. 590, 58 S. Ct. 1053) (rehearing denied, 304 U. S. 439, 58 S. Ct. 980) is authority for the proposition that collecting of admissions for football games by State universities is not an essential Government function and that therefore such activities are not immune from Federal taxation.

Helvering v. Therrell (303 U. S. 218 (1938)) is frequently cited as a support for the proposition that a State employee can claim no exemption from Federal income taxation if he is not paid by State moneys. However, the court, in holding that a liquidator of State banks was not immune from Federal tax, did so in a manner that prevents this case from being authority for such a proposition. The ratio decidendi mentions more considerations. The taxpayers were not officers of the State in the strict sense. The business of liquidating the banks and insurance companies was not a governmental function. The corporations being liquidated were private enterprises and the taxpayers were paid from private assets. It is clear that the first two considerations would have in themselves supported the court's decision.

The above-cited cases allow no contradiction to the assertion that at the time of the Gerhardt and O'Keefe cases (the implications of which formed the subject matter of remedial legislation in the 1939 Public Salary Tax Act) it was State employees engaged in the performance of nonessential or proprietary functions of government who constituted the class that had reason to know that they always had been subject to Federal income tax in the light of established law existing before the Gerhardt and O'Keefe decisions. It is significant that not a single case considered the derivation of funds out of which compensation of the employees were paid as having a controlling significance. As pointed out, the Therrell case, which is frequently cited in support of the "derivation of funds" theory, found that the services performed were nonessential to Government, and hence the case is entirely foursquare with the "essential versus nonessential governmental functions" basis of classification.

A brief reference to the history of income-tax legislation will further disclose the error in denominating State employees who would be paid directly or indirectly from Federal funds as those "who had no legal basis for believing their compensation to be exempt."

The Revenue Act of 1913 imposed the first income tax levied pursuant to the authority of the sixteenth amendment. This act contained an express exemption relating to all State officers and employees except those having their compensation paid by the Federal Government. The Revenue Acts of 1916 and 1917 continued these exemptions. However, after considerable debate on constitutional considerations, the 1918 Revenue Act as passed deleted any reference to State employees. No mention was made one way or the other concerning them—this regardless of how their salaries happened to be derived. There was, however, an express inclusion of Federal officers and employees. Each subsequent revenue act up to the time of the 1939 Public Salary Tax Act likewise failed to make any specific mention of State employees as being taxable or nontaxable. Presumably, because of the elimination of the specific exemption language in the 1918 Revenue Act, the Secretary of the Treasury requested and received from the Attorney General of the United States an opinion to the effect that even though the act did not expressly include or exclude compensation paid State and municipal employees, it could not be assumed that there was an intent to tax salaries of State employees, because "there cannot be any doubt but that such wages and salaries are beyond the taxing powers of Congress" (opinions of Attorney General Palmer, May 6, 1919).

To those pointing out that the early Revenue Acts of 1913, 1916, and 1917 contained specific exemptions relating to State employees, it is clear that subsequent Supreme Court decisions above-cited recognize that in general the limitation was of a constitutional rather than of a statutory nature, since, as was later developed by the cases above-discussed, Congress had no power to tax State employees except those performing nonessential functions of Government. Therefore, the effect of the exemption language relating to State employees in the 1913, 1916, and 1917 acts was to exclude from taxation only these "nonessential employees," except those of this group that were paid from Federal funds. Stated another way, the early statutory language, as was finally made apparent by court decisions, achieved an exemption of State employees who were in nonessential governmental services and who were not paid from Federal funds. When this language was dropped out of the series of Revenue Acts beginning in 1918, the situation was entirely controlled by constitutional considerations. Thus, had the early statutory exemption language remained, it is an accurate statement, in the light of subsequent Supreme Court decisions, to say that an employee engaged in the performance of services in an essentially governmental function would have been exempt, regardless of the fact that he might have been deriving his salary from funds furnished the State and Federal Governments.

A reference to the series of "regulations" issued by the Treasury which relate to corresponding revenue acts will further evidence that there is little, if anything, to charge employees paid directly or indirectly by the Federal Government with a sure knowledge of their Federal tax liability. Regulations 33 and Revised Regulations 33, relating to the 1913 and the 1916–17 Revenue Acts, respectively, contain articles defining and interpreting the corresponding express statutory exclusion of State employees. When the express statutory exemption of State employees was discontinued in 1918, the regulations for that year and subsequent revenue acts down to 1926 point out that all State officers and employees were immune.

Very far from restricting immunity to those not paid by Federal funds, the regulations relating to the Revenue Act of 1916 and each Revenue Act thereafter until 1934 mentioned employees who were paid out of Smith-Lever funds (that is, Federal funds) as examples of State employees who were not liable to pay Federal income taxes. The 1926 regulations reflect the significance attached by the Treasury to the decision in the Metcalf and Eddy case, and articles of the regulations distinguished for the first time State employees engaged in nonessential governmental functions from those engaged in essential governmental functions. Specific mention of this "essential" and "nonessential" classification exists until 1938, at which time the regulations proceed to beg the question by specifying that State officers and employees were subject to tax on all compensation received by them "except that which was immune from taxation under the Constitution of the United States."

In 1934 and 1936, though, as before stated, the regulations base tax immunity on the then accepted constitutional principle of essential against nonessential governmental function. Reference is again made in the regulations—and seemingly without any basis in the statutes or court decisions—that compensation of a State employee is not immune if derived directly or indirectly from Federal money. There is no attempt made to reconcile this seemingly irreconcilable classification with the essential against nonessential" classification. Certainly State employees could not be charged with any clear understanding of a definite legal liability on their part by this reference to Federal funds in the 1934 and 1936 regulations.

After specifying that federally derived State salaries were taxable in the 1934 and 1936 regulations, as before stated, the regulations proceeded to beg the whole question in 1938 by pointing out that all State salaries were subject to tax except those that were constitutionally immune. Apparently the Treasury Department at this point gave up trying to fairly and correctly interpret the existing state of law and put taxpayers on their own in trying to ascertain what the state of law might be.

It is not necessary for the purpose of this analysis to examine as to the validity of the Treasury Department's contention set forward in the regulations of 1934 and 1936 to the effect that State employees were liable to the extent that they were paid directly or indirectly by the Federal Government. It suffices to show here that the state of existing law during this period of time certainly would not warrant the conclusion that this class had always been considered liable to pay Federal income tax and consequently "had no legal basis for believing their income to be exempt." As the preceding analysis of controlling case law, legislation, and Treasury Department regulations demonstrates, the theory of nonimmunity of State salaries because of Federal fund derivation could in no manner be considered as the accepted criteria for distinguishing State employees who were immune from Federal taxation from those who were not so immune.

The case of Hanson v. Landy (24 Fed. Supp. 535) apparently is not only the first case but the only case that tests the contention of the Treasury Department in its 1934 and 1936 regulations that State employees paid with Federal funds are subject to Federal income tax. The employee was a professor in the agricultural college of the State university of Minnesota and was paid from Smith-Lever funds. The court held that there was no immunity from taxation, since the fact that the State did not pay the salary could allow of no conclusion that a burden was imposed on the State government by the Federal tax. It is quite clear that the ratio decedendi of the case does not make taxability turn upon the derivation of funds from Federal sources merely, but rather on the fact that the salaries were derived from sources other than the State. The case was decided August 3, 1938 (less than a year before the enactment of the Public Salary Tax Act), which would hardly support the proposition that State employees paid out of Federal funds had always known that they were subject to Federal income tax.

The district court had before it the decision in the Helvering case and its interpretation of the significance of this case can be questioned. The court stated that "according to more recent decisions immunity may be claimed from taxes by persons employed by the State—engaged in the performance of an essential governmental function when it clearly appears that the burden on the State would be actual and substantial and would not be merely conjectural." It is submitted that neither the Helvering case, nor any case prior thereto, concerned itself with whether or not a burden was imposed, after it had determined that the service performed related to an essential governmental function. It is of importance to note in passing that the district court found that the Treasury Department had been in error in excluding the Smith-Lever group of State employees in their previous regulations. Certainly, if the Treasury Department had been in error all these years, how could it be said that this group of State employees or any other State employees paid out of Federal funds had had full reason to know their legal responsibility to pay Federal taxes in the past?

Whatever might have been the importance of the district court decision in the Hanson case was considerably dissipated by a decision of the circuit court of the seventh district in Helvering v. Stilwell (101 Fed. (2d) 588). It was the Government's contention that the income of a master in a chancery court in the State of Illinois who was compensated by fees paid by litigants was subject to tax because, since his compensation was not paid by the State, there could be no burden in imposing the tax. That this question of derivation of funds as a criterion of tax immunity was an original one was conceded by the Government, and the court pointing out that "the precise question here presented, that is, where the taxpayer, though he be an officer of the State government, receives his compensation from sources other than the State, or the political subdivision of which he is an officer, is immune from Federal taxation, has not been decided by the Supreme Court is conceded. We are urged, however, to adopt what is claimed to be the more modern theory that immunity from Federal tax is allowable only where there is a resultant burden upon the State, and where as here compensation of the taxpayer is payable from a source other than the State itself, there can be no such burden upon the State and consequently no immunity."

It was this more modern doctrine referred to in the above quotation that was the basis of the Government's endeavor to declare in the 1934 and 1936 regulations that State employees paid directly or indirectly by Federal funds were taxable and the basis of the Government's argument which prevailed in the Hanson case. The court denied the claims of the Government and held that the test of immunity had been and continued to be that of whether an employee is engaged in performing an essential or nonessential function of the Government. The easily recognizable significance of this case in the present matter is greatly enhanced by the fact that the court had before it the Gerhardt case. The opinion of this court was that the Gerhardt case did not destroy the old doctrine of immunity or change the basis thereof, but rather restricted its application. It is certainly pertinent to this analysis to point out that the Supreme Court refused to review the circuit court's decision (Helvering v. Stilwell (307 U. S. 644)). It would seem, therefore, that the Treasury Department's theory as to salary derivation being the test of immunity has been discredited by the highest court to which it has been brought. The decision was handed down on March 9, 1939, immediately preceding the approval of the Public Salary Tax Act on April 20. In the light of this decision alone and without reference to the other weighty considerations herein considered, it can be fairly stated that at the time of the passage of the act, State employees could not be justly charged with the knowledge that their income was subject to tax because it was derived from sources other than the State and in such a manner that a Federal tax did not place a burden on the State.

Apparently there is reliance on section 1211 of the Revenue Act of 1926 as evidence that State employees paid directly or indirectly from Federal funds have always been considered subject to Federal income taxation. (Senator WILEY, of Wisconsin, for instance, was so informed by representatives of the Internal Revenue Bureau.)

Section 1211 of the 1926 Revenue Act abated all past liability with respect to Federal income taxes imposed "upon any individual in respect of amounts received by him as compensation for personal services as an officer or an employee of any State * * * (except to the extent that such compensation is paid by the United States Government directly or indirectly)."

Reference to the legislative history of the section shows that congressional intent was in no manner predicated on any idea that State employees receiving Federal funds had been, previous to the enactment of section 1211, any more subject to Federal income taxation than any other class.

Section 1211 was the congressional answer to the implications of the Metcalf and Eddy decision in 1926. Senators Butler and Howell pointed out the grossly inequitable situation resulting from Treasury Department action with reference to the Supreme Court decision. They asserted that State employees who had had no reason for believing that they were subject to Federal income tax were presently being apprised of their liability on their past earnings. (It is to be recalled that the Treasury regulations commencing with the Revenue Act of 1918, which deleted all reference to State employees, specified that all State officers and employees were immune—this without reference to any qualifications.)

Section 1211 represented amendments by Senators SHIPSTEAD and Butler to correct the situation. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 67, pt. IV, pp. 3853–3855, incl.) Section 1211 constituted abating legislation and did not, as suggested, declare as to the Federal tax liability of any group, but rather relieved through abatement such liability as might obtain with respect to State employees generally, except a specified number of the group. The failure to relieve such liability as existed with reference to this group clearly is to be distinguished from imposing liability with respect to the group. Reference to the remarks of the sponsors and active supporters of the measure will demonstrate that they had no well-defined ideas as to what State employees might or might not be subject to Federal taxation by reason of the Metcalf and Eddy decision but were seeking only to take preventive action. There is no indication as to why possible liability was continued with respect to State employees paid out of Federal funds. The possible explanation is that section 1211, as was the 1939 Public Salary Tax Act, was drafted by the Treasury Department and premised then (as now) upon erroneous conceptions. One would have to fully understand the conception of the Metcalf and Eddy decision that existed in the minds of the drafters of section 1211 and know precisely the status, functions, and relations to State and local government of those who at that time derived their pay directly or indirectly from Federal funds and who were deemed to have been affected by the Metcalf and Eddy decision, in order to properly appreciate the situation. It is clear that there was no thought at the time that all governmental workers paid directly or indirectly out of Federal funds were, by reason of the enactment of section 1211, bound to pay the Federal tax. Subsequent to the enactment of section 1211 the Treasury continued to treat employees paid out of Smith-Lever funds as a class representative of those immune from Federal income taxation.

The treatment afforded State employees paid out of Smith-Lever funds by Treasury regulations not only constitutes proof that the Treasury Department has itself never considered all Federally paid State employees as subject to Federal income taxation but it is likewise illustrative of the very grave inequities that will be practiced by the failure to abate liability of all State employees and this without the exception presently made in the 1939 Public Salary Tax Act.

The inequities in the position of the Treasury Department are patent. After they had been treated as specific illustrations of an immune class for the period of years indicated, the recent Treasury Department release in interpretation of the 1939 salary act entitled "Taxability of Compensation Received by Federal Officers and Employees and Officers and Employees of the State (It. mimeo. col. No. 4916—R. A. No. 978)" expressly states that the employees who have received Smith-Lever funds are not entitled to abating action of the Public Salary Tax Act but are consequently liable for all back taxes—this because of their Federally derived funds.

CONCLUSION

The Supreme Court decisions in the Gerhardt and O'Keefe cases substantially altered the doctrine of constitutional immunity from taxation of the salaries of State and Federal employees. In the 1939 Public Salary Tax Act, Congress intended to relieve all State employees of liability to pay Federal income taxes that might accrue by reason of these decisions except in those instances where the State employees "had no legal reason to believe that their compensation had ever been exempt from taxation." The only class of State employees who, through the previous years, could have been charged with the knowledge of liability to pay Federal income taxes were State employees engaged in what the courts from time to time had held to be nonessential governmental functions. State employees performing essential governmental functions had no reason whatsoever to believe that constitutional immunity did not attach to their earnings merely because their compensation had been paid directly or indirectly out of Federal funds. For many years Federal tax regulations expressly exempted from Federal income taxes groups of State employees who were paid out of Federal funds. Not until 1934 did the Treasury regulations consider that there was no immunity from taxation if the funds were paid directly or indirectly by the Federal Government. The contention that the source of salary derivation was of primary importance in considering whether there was a burden on the State and consequently whether the salary was taxable was adopted by a court for the first time in 1938, and in another case the contention was expressly disallowed by the highest court which has ever entertained the issue.

The proper appreciation of section 1211 of the 1926 Revenue Act disallows it being considered as evidence that all State employees paid from Federal funds have always been considered as liable to pay Federal taxes. The section did not attempt to create liability; it was an abating provision intended to relieve liability of an undefined class of employees who might have been affected by a court decision at that time. As shown by its subsequent regulations, the Treasury Department did not itself consider that all State employees paid out of Federal funds were affected by the section. In any event, the Supreme Court decisions, both prior and subsequent to the enactment of this section, have pointed out that the matter of taxation of State employees is a constitutional question. The enactment of section 1211 was not only not premised on congressional thought that all State employees paid out of Federal funds were subject to Federal tax but Congress could not have, had it desired to, proposed such a liability in the light of the constitutional doctrine of immunity as then enunciated by the Supreme Court. It is quite clear that, at the time of the enactment of the 1939 Public Salary Tax Act, State employees paid directly or indirectly by Federal funds had no reason whatsoever to know that as a group they had been for the past period of years subject to the taxing jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

STANLEY RECTOR,
Counsel for Industrial Commission.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not offer this amendment to this particular joint resolution. I assure him that at the first opportunity which the Committee on Finance has, when a revenue bill or a tariff bill comes over from the House of Representatives—and I expect one to come over here pretty soon—this matter will be considered. I say this so that no one will get the wrong impression and think that a major tax bill is coming over. It is expected that a tariff bill of some kind will come here before long, and we will then take up and consider the matter referred to by the Senator. I hope the amendment will not be adopted as a part of this joint resolution, which deals with an entirely different subject.

Mr. WILEY. I appreciate the remarks of the distinguished Senator. I should like to ask him a question. Does he approve the principle of this amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. We will get a full report regarding it from the Treasury Department and from the experts of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation. From the reading of the amendment at the desk there seems to be something in it. I do not refer to the first draft the Senator presented, but we will consider the second draft of the amendment which the Senator has offered. The experts and the Treasury Department will go over it, and I assure the Senator that we will give it every consideration. That is all I can promise.

Mr. WILEY. I take it that the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi would apply whether or not this amendment were defeated. I have promised my constituents back home that I would attempt to have the amendment made a rider upon this joint resolution. Therefore I cannot agree to withdraw the amendment; but, if it has merit, we at least have had publicity for it, and I ask every Senator whose constituents are affected to give it consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask for a division on the amendment.

Mr. WILEY and Mr. McNARY called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. McNARY. I ask for a division.

On a division the ayes were 19, the noes were 51, so the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendment, the question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. ASHURST. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

SENATE

MONDAY, APRIL 8, 1940

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, the everlasting Lord and Father, who art with us in all our ways, we beseech Thee, as we bow our hearts in prayer, to fill us with the strengthening peace of Thy conscious presence and with the knowledge that love is at the root of everything, for it alone can bring us back from the solitude which is haunted with perplexity into our true relationship with our fellow man and the Christ who knows the joys and sorrows of our ever-changing life. May we always place the value of the soul above the body, character above circumstance, and with simple loving worship, by continual obedience to the call of duty and by purifying ourselves, even as Thou art pure, may we creep ever closer unto Thee who art the last great certainty of life. We ask it in the name and for the sake of Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Friday, April 5, 1940, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed the following act and joint resolution:

On April 4, 1940:

S. 1955. An act to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to delegate certain regulatory functions.

On April 5, 1940:

S. J. Res. 226. Joint resolution providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Donahey	King	Schwellenbach
Ashurst	Downey	La Follette	Sheppard
Austin	Ellender	Lee	Shipstead
Bailey	Frazier	Lodge	Smathers

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senators from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS and Mr. SLATTERY], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RADCLIFFE], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] are detained from the Senate on important public business.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is unavoidably detained.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Out of order, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 8913, the legislative appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I inquire if the motion of the Senator from Maryland takes precedence over a resolution which has been on the desk for some time and which went over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland is asking unanimous consent to dispense with the morning hour for the purpose of considering a certain appropriation bill.

Mr. BYRD. I will have to object. A resolution submitted by me has been on the desk for nearly 30 days, and it is very important, I think, that it should be acted on.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, would a motion be in order to proceed with the consideration of the bill to which I have referred?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No. The Senate met this morning following an adjournment, and the provision of paragraph 3 of rule VII as to the call of the calendar on Mondays is effective.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, let me say that the morning hour will probably not last long; it does not usually do so; and I think there will probably be no difficulty about having the bill of the Senator from Maryland considered.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE SENATOR BORAH

He also, from the same committee, to which was recommitted the bill (S. 1681) to amend section 107 of the Judicial Code to create a mountain district in the State of Tennessee, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1390) thereon.

REDUCTION OF CAPITAL FUNDS OF CERTAIN CREDIT CORPORATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 243) submitted by Mr. BYRD on March 12, 1940, as follows:

Whereas the President, in his Budget message of January 3, 1940, estimated that it would be feasible to reduce by $700,000,000 the capital funds of certain credit corporations established by the Government at various times as emergencies have arisen; and

Whereas the credit corporations referred to in such message were not specifically enumerated, and repeated requests to have the Director of the Bureau of the Budget identify or enumerate such corporations have been denied; and

Whereas it is essential, in the public interest, that full information with respect to the reduction of the capital funds of such corporations be furnished to the Senate: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Director of the Bureau of the Budget is hereby requested to submit to the Senate immediately a list of the credit corporations whose capital funds are proposed to be reduced, in accordance with the Budget message of the President of January 3, 1940, and the amount of the proposed reduction of capital funds in the case of each such corporation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution; but I now suggest to the Senator from Virginia publicly what I suggested to him in a private conversation a few moments ago.

The Senator's resolution has three whereases. The first one refers to the fact that the President in his Budget message estimated that $700,000,000 could be turned back into the Treasury by Government credit corporations. The second whereas states that the credit corporations referred to in the message were not specifically enumerated—

And repeated requests to have the Director of the Bureau of the Budget identify or enumerate such corporations have been denied.

The third whereas states that it is essential in the public interest that full information with respect to the matter be furnished to the Senate.

I very much doubt the propriety of having a whereas state that the Director of the Bureau of the Budget has denied this information. In the first place, the Senate has not asked him for it, though I understand that the Senator from Virginia in his individual capacity has asked the Director of the Budget for the information.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Is not an individual Senator entitled to information with respect to the Budget?

Mr. BARKLEY. I should think so, yes; but it ought not to be made a matter of public record that the Director of the Budget has denied this information.

Mr. BYRD. But the truth can be made a matter of public record.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senate has made no official request of the Director of the Budget. It may be that the Director of the Budget has no authority to give the Senator that information, although I am not certain about that. It seems to me that the same purpose would be accomplished—all the Senator wants is the information—by eliminating the part of the second "whereas" which indicates that the Director of the Budget has willfully denied the information.

Mr. BYRD. I did not use the word "willfully."

Mr. BARKLEY. The language of the "whereas" carries the implication that it has been willfully denied.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator from Virginia wants the country to know that this information has been denied to him.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suppose the Senator merely wants the information. I assume that if he gets the information he does not desire to cast any aspersions on anybody, or to reflect on anybody.

Mr. BYRD. All the Senator from Virginia wants to do is to state the facts. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that on January 12 I wrote to the Director of the Budget asking for this information. He replied on January 17 saying that the information was not available. After waiting 40 days I wrote to him again on February 28. Then the Director of the Budget came to see the Senator from Virginia, and said he could not give him the complete information, but would give certain information in confidence. The Senator from Virginia said he had no desire to be informed in confidence; that he wanted the information for the use of the Senate and the public. I then submitted, on March 12, this resolution which has been pending since then.

I decline to modify the preamble of the resolution, because it is strictly and literally true in accordance with the facts.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then, Mr. President, I move to amend the second "whereas" by inserting, after the word "repeated", the word "individual", so that it will read "repeated individual requests." Certainly the resolution ought not to carry the implication that the Senate or the House or any official thereof in his official capacity had been denied this information. Inasmuch as the requests were individual requests, the Senator ought not to object to that amendment of the "whereas."

Mr. BYRD. But the resolution does not say to whom the requests were denied. It says, "Repeated requests to have the Director of the Bureau of the Budget identify or enumerate such corporations have been denied." He could not have denied the request of the Senate, because the Senate has not requested the information.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator says he has asked for the information in his individual capacity as a Senator. Has the Senator any objection to saying that it was an individual request?

Mr. BYRD. There is no need that I can see of saying that. It is a question of fact; that is all. I and others have asked for this information, and it has been denied.

Mr. BARKLEY. The "whereas" carries the implication that numerous requests have been made, perhaps by numerous Senators, and denied. Nobody has requested it except the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Does the Senator know that?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not know it, but I do not think a number of requests have been made by those interested in the Budget.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. I should like to state that I made a request, which also was denied.

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, I am not concerned about whether or not the Senator from Virginia is willing to modify his "whereas." Frequently "whereases" are entirely eliminated from resolutions of this sort, because all the Senate wants is information. The Senate, I assume, is not concerned about how many individual Senators have written letters to somebody to obtain information. It is not customary to set out the unsuccessful efforts of individual Senators to obtain information as a basis for the adoption by the Senate of a resolution asking for information. I think the Senator from Virginia would be well within the proprieties even if he agreed to the entire elimination of the "whereases," because then the Senate would get the information, I presume, simply by the adoption of a resolution asking for it.

If the Director of the Budget does not furnish the information in response to this resolution, or makes a report which is not satisfactory, it will be an official matter for the Senate to deal with; but the Director of the Budget may be laboring under some restrictions as to his ability to give out this information. The statement was contained in the President's message, not in the report of the Director of the Budget.

Mr. BYRD. Does not the Senator think the information should have been furnished when the Budget was presented to the Senate on January 3?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know whether it should or not. I do not know whether or not it was possible to furnish it. It might not have been possible then to identify the corporations.

Mr. BYRD. If it was not possible to furnish the information I request, the statement should not have been included in the Budget, because that is a question directly involving the increase of the debt limit, as the Senator well knows.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is a matter over which we have no control. The President in his Budget message estimated that there would be that much saving.

Mr. BYRD. It is not a question of saving. The Senator is misinformed about that. It is a question of recovering into the General Treasury $700,000,000 from the assets of these corporations.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not care anything about the term that may be used. If it is recovered, it will probably be to that extent a saving. At any rate, whether the President should or should not have included a break-down of the $700,000,000, he did not do it, and I do not know whether or not he could have done it at that time. It was an estimate. Inasmuch as this was an estimate of the President, the Director of the Budget may not feel authorized to break down the figures. I do not know.

Mr. BYRD. The Director of the Budget prepares the Budget for the President.

Mr. BARKLEY. He does in a way; but, of course, the President goes over it and has something to do with it himself. Officially, it is the President's message and not the message of the Director of the Budget.

Mr. BYRD. If that be the case, then will the Senator agree to a resolution directing the President of the United States to furnish this information immediately?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I would not agree to a resolution directing the President to do so. I would agree to one requesting him to furnish it, if it is not incompatible with the public service to do so. I do not think we can direct the President.

Mr. BYRD. Then the Senator does not think the Congress is entitled to this information?

Mr. BARKLEY. I not only do not think it is not entitled to it, but the Senator has no basis upon which to make that statement. I have not indicated that Congress is not entitled to it. I say Congress is entitled to it.

Mr. BYRD. Again I ask, Does not the Senator think we should have had the information 3 months ago, when the Budget was first submitted?

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not going to pass on that question.

Mr. BYRD. If we are entitled to it at any time, we were entitled to it when the Budget first came in, and certainly we are entitled to it now, as otherwise the Congress cannot intelligently consider pending appropriations.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not going to pass on the question of the time when the Senate should have had the estimate or how accurate it might have been when made, or anything of the kind. All I have suggested is that the resolution carries the implication that the Director of the Budget has willfully denied this information.

Mr. BYRD. I will say to the Senator that it carries the truthful implication. I can prove by correspondence and a personal interview with the Director of the Budget that the information has been denied.

Mr. BARKLEY. There are frequently failures on the part of subordinate officers to furnish information which they may not think they are authorized to furnish. This was not the message of the Director of the Budget to Congress. It was the President's message. The Senator may do as he pleases about it; but, it seems to me, in the interest of fairness and in the interest of obtaining the information which the Senator wants, he ought to eliminate the implication that the Director of the Budget, either on his own account or on some other person's account, has deliberately and willfully refused to give the Senator the information which he has sought.

If the Senator wants the language to remain as it is, I am not going to object to it, but I think he ought to eliminate it.

Mr. BYRD. I am not willing to eliminate it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

ORDER DISPENSING WITH CALL OF CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar, under rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the call of the calendar be dispensed with. I may say to Senators that it is my purpose to try to arrange for a call of the calendar on Wednesday of this week.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I shall not object to dispensing with the call of the calendar this morning, but I did want to have assurance that we would proceed with the call by Wednesday.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is my purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 8913, the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8913) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will state the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Senate—office of the Secretary", on page 29, line 18, after the word "and", to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$1,500"; in line 20, after the figures "$5,000", to strike out "and $2,000 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent"; in line 23, after the word "and", to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$1,500"; in line 25, after the name "Journal Clerk", to strike out "$3,780" and insert "$4,000"; on page 3, line 3, after the word "librarian", to strike out "$3,360" and insert "$3,600"; in line 6, after the word "clerks", to strike out "one at $3,180" and insert "two at $3,180 each"; in line 7, before the word "at" where it occurs the first time, to strike out "four" and insert "three"; in line 10, after the figures "$2,460" and the semicolon, to strike out "press relations officer, $2,140" and insert press relations officers—one at $2,140, one at $1,900 in lieu of one of the positions authorized by Senate Resolution No. 428, agreed to February 17, 1931, which position is hereby abolished as of July 1, 1940"; and in line 17, after the words "in all", to strike out "$142,880" and insert "$144,540", so as to read:

Salaries: Secretary of the Senate, including compensation as disbursing officer of salaries of Senators and of contingent fund of the Senate, $8,000; Chief Clerk, who shall perform the duties of reading clerk, $5,500 and $1,500 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent; financial clerk, $5,000; assistant financial clerk, $4,500; Parliamentarian, $5,000 and $1,500 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent; Journal Clerk, $4,000; principal clerk, $3,780; legislative clerk, $4,000 and $1,000 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent; enrolling clerk, $4,000; printing clerk, $3,540; chief bookkeeper, $3,600; librarian, $3,600; assistant Journal Clerk, $3,360; executive clerk, $3,180; first assistant librarian, $3,120; keeper of stationery, $3,320; clerks—two at $3,180 each, three at $2,400 each, three at $2,640 each, clerk in Disbursing Office, $2,400, six at $2,400 each, three at $1,860 each, three at $1,740 each; special officer, $2,460; press relations officers—one at $2,140, one at $1,900 in lieu of one of the positions authorized by Senate Resolution No. 428, agreed to February 17, 1931, which position is hereby abolished as of July 1, 1940; messenger, $1,260; laborers—one at $1,740, one at $1,620, five at $1,330 each, one in Secretary's office, $1,680, one, $1,560, one, $1,260; in all, $144,540.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Committee employees", on page 6, line 19, after the figures "$2,880", to insert "assistant clerk, $2,520"; and in line 20, before the word "assistant", to strike out "four" and insert "three", so as to read:

Post Office and Post Roads—clerk, $3,900; assistant clerk, $2,880; assistant clerk, $2,520; three assistant clerks at $2,220 each; additional clerk, $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 13, to change the total appropriation for committee employees from "$505,960" to "$506,260."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland what change has been made in the existing law with respect to the Capitol police.

Mr. TYDINGS. None. Let me say at this time, so that Senators may understand, that the bill as it came from the House contained recommendations for appropriations of $23,907,744. The amount of the reduction by the Senate committee is, net, $202,224. The amount of the bill as reported to the Senate is $23,705,520. The Senate committee made net reductions in the bill, and only a few routine items were disturbed, involving very little money, with the exception of the appropriation for the Library of Congress, which was given $40,000 additional for the Legislative Research Bureau, and another sum to take care of some purchases of a nature which, if not made now, would mean the loss of valuable additions to the Library. Otherwise the bill is almost entirely routine.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator state whether there has been an increase or a reduction in the entire appropriation?

Mr. TYDINGS. The bill carries $202,224 less than as it passed the House, and it is under the estimates for 1941 by $2,084,092 and exceeds the appropriations for 1940 by $424,077.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper," on page 8, line 12, after the word "and", to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$1,500", so as to read:

Salaries: Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper, $8,000; two secretaries (one for the majority and one for the minority), at $5,400 each and $1,500 additional each so long as the respective positions are held by the present respective incumbents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, at the beginning of line 26, to strike out "$2,400" and insert "$2,600", so as to read:

Upholsterer and locksmith, $2,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 18, after the words "in all", to change the total appropriation for the Office of Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper, from "$267,844" to "$269,044."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Office of legislative counsel", on page 26, line 22, after the name "House of Representatives", to insert a colon and "Provided, That after the date of enactment of this act the rate of compensation of the legislative counsel of the Senate shall be the same as that of the legislative counsel of the House of Representatives", so as to read:

Salaries and expenses: For salaries and expenses of maintenance of the office of legislative counsel, as authorized by law, $77,500, of which $37,500 shall be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and $40,000 by the Clerk of the House of Representatives: Provided, That after the date of enactment of this act the rate of compensation of the legislative counsel of the Senate shall be the same as that of the legislative counsel of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Architect of the Capitol—Capitol Buildings and Grounds," on page 28, line 11, after the word "directory", to strike out "$302,675" and insert "$304,041", so as to read:

Capitol Buildings: For necessary expenditures for the Capitol Building and electrical substations of the Senate and House Office Buildings, under the jurisdiction of the Architect of the Capitol, including minor improvements, maintenance, repair, equipment, supplies, material, fuel, oil, waste, and appurtenances; furnishings and office equipment; special clothing for workmen; waterproof wearing apparel; personal and other services; cleaning and repairing works of art; purchase or exchange (not to exceed $1,000), maintenance, and driving of motor-propelled passenger-carrying office vehicle; not exceeding $300 for the purchase of technical and necessary reference books, periodicals, and city directory; $304,041.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 11, to strike out:

Terraces of Capitol Building: For reconstruction and repair of the terraces of the Capitol Building, including all necessary work in connection therewith, and not to exceed $15,000 for personal and other services, including the employment of engineering and other professional and technical services without regard to section 35 of the Public Buildings Act approved June 25, 1910, as amended, $350,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until June 30, 1942.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 4, after the words "Revised Statutes", to strike out "$131,415" and insert "$131,991", so as to read:

ceeding $500 for necessary traveling expenses connected with such service and for expenses of attendance at meetings when incurred on the written authority and direction of the Librarian.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the committee amendments. The bill is still before the Senate and open to further amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Maryland about a matter pertaining to the Library of Congress. A few days ago I received a communication from Mr. MacLeish, the Librarian, who, by the way, is giving daily evidence of his magnificent qualifications for the position which he holds, calling attention to reports which have been made by the authorities of the District of Columbia upon certain fire hazards in the old Library Building. Information to this effect came to me, I think, too late for me to go before the committee during its consideration of the pending bill. Did the committee give any consideration to that matter or was it brought to the attention of the committee?

Mr. TYDINGS. It was not brought to the attention of the committee; but let me say to the Senator from Kentucky that if there is a real danger, it would be possible to include an appropriation to take care of the matter in the next deficiency bill. It had not been developed that the documents referred to in the communication were in danger at the time the committee closed its hearings and reported the bill to the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have photostatic copies of reports of the fire department of the District of Columbia, which show certain very definite hazards in the old Library Building, and I wanted to bring the matter to the attention of the Senator from Maryland so that he might look into it and give consideration to the question of whether some provision should not be made for it in the deficiency bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator, of course, already knows that, now that the legislative appropriation bill is before the Senate, if the hazard is a great one, it would be advisable for Mr. MacLeish to go before the Committee on Appropriations on the deficiency bill and ask for such appropriation as would take care of the elimination of the hazard. That is the one thing which could be done at this session to accomplish what Mr. MacLeish has in mind.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment, but before doing so I desire to state to the Senator from Maryland what the amendment is.

Some weeks ago the Senate ordered the compilation and publication of all the Senate contested-election cases from the date of the last publication down to the present time. It will be by far the largest volume of contested-election cases. Approximately every 10 years the publication of these cases has been brought down to date. The Senate adopted Senate Resolution 229 on February 7, 1940, and I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill to carry out the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. TYDINGS. How much would it cost?

Mr. GEORGE. Two thousand dollars.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator had brought the matter to our attention, we would have included it in the bill, no doubt.

Mr. GEORGE. I would have done so, but the work had not been quite completed.

Mr. TYDINGS. While I have no authority to speak for the committee, so far as I am individually concerned I think this is a proper item, and should be in the bill. If the Senator will offer the amendment, we will be very glad to take it to conference. If the Senator wants the money to be immediately available, he should include a provision in his amendment to that effect.

Mr. GEORGE. I move that there be inserted in the bill at the proper place the following:

For expenses of compiling Senate contested-election cases as authorized by Senate Resolution No. 229, agreed to February 7, 1940, $2,000, to be immediately available.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert, on page 10, after line 25, the following:

For expenses of compiling Senate contested-election cases as authorized by Senate Resolution No. 229, agreed to February 7, 1940, $2,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, one of the items already agreed to, for the legislative reference service, is one in which I have been greatly interested for a number of years. I do not wish to detain the Senate, but I ask unanimous consent that I may have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks at this point the statement which I made before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations regarding the legislative reference service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE SERVICE

STATEMENT OF HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR., A UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF WISCONSIN

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE FOR THE LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE SERVICE

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I appreciate this opportunity to appear briefly before the committee to urge upon it the favorable consideration of the supplemental estimate submitted by the legislative reference service of the Library of Congress. That amounts to $86,750, as I understand it. The legislative-reference idea, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, originated in my own State. Starting in 1900, it was largely a glorified clipping bureau, but under the leadership of the late Dr. Charles McCarthy the service rendered such great assistance to the members of the legislature that it was established as a department of the Wisconsin Library Commission, and since that time it has grown into a service which all members of the legislature regard as literally invaluable.

INADEQUATE FUNDS FOR LEGISTATIVE REFERENCE SERVICE

In 1911 my father was instrumental in securing an original appropriation for the legislative reference service of the Library of Congress. The Congress, however, has never really given the legislative reference service sufficient appropriations to make it the effective instrumentality which it could be in service to Members of both Houses of Congress.

As we all know, our economic life has become more and more complex during the years, and as a result the problems with which Congress is confronted have grown in complexity. Congress has been overly modest, if I can phrase it in that way, about providing itself with the necessary service in the form of analysis and digestion of available material to meet these increased responsibilities. Year after year the executive branch of the Government, and I make no criticism of this, has submitted estimate after estimate to further increase their technical and expert service, and I think it has been necessary, but Congress has consistently failed, as I view it, to provide itself with the necessary expert service.

Senator ADAMS. Senator LA FOLLETTE, is not that the habit of Congress always, to be generous to every other service in the Government except those things which minister to itself?

VALUE OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL REVENUE TAXATION

Senator LA FOLLETTE. I think that is true, and you have made my point in just one sentence. I think we made a big step forward, for example, when Congress created the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation and established a staff. I feel certain that every member of the Finance Committee and every member of the Ways and Means Committee recognizes the valuable service and the increased efficiency of both committees and both branches of the Congress in dealing with the complex problems that are involved in taxation as a result of the establishment of the Joint Committee on Taxation and its permanent staff.

Now, the Library of Congress is a literal storehouse of information; but with the pressure of time and the multiplicity of the duties of Members of Congress, it is literally impossible for them to do the necessary digesting and arrangement of the material which is available in order that it may be placed in a form so that it can be brought to bear upon the definite and specific problems with which Congress must deal.

Senator TYDINGS. Senator, could I interrupt you, just in line with the argument, to ask Mr. MacLeish this question?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

QUESTIONS AS TO FUTURE INCREASES

Senator TYDINGS. Assuming that this $86,750 was given for this service, is it your idea that there would be any considerable increase in the next, say, 5 or 10 years, or would that sum approximately run it efficiently?

Mr. MACLEISH. It is our idea that that sum would enable us to set up a service which would function along the lines that Senator La Follette is so well laying out; that is, we would be able, with that amount of money, to provide a skillful research service practically throughout the general field.

Senator TYDINGS. It would be carried as a yearly contribution so that it could function without coming for $150,000 in a year or so?

Mr. MACLEISH. I believe so.

Senator TYDINGS. Of course, it is an estimate, but I just wanted your opinion.

Excuse me, Senator.

POSITION TAKEN BY HOUSE COMMITTEE

Senator LA FOLLETTE. I am very happy to have that statement, because I think it is fair to say, from an examination of both the House hearings and the report of the committee, that members of the committee were much impressed with the testimony, but the full committee seems to have felt, as I read their report, that in view of the fact that there were experts and research activities in the executive branch of the Government, there was some question as to whether a similar activity should be undertaken by the Congress. I have the utmost respect for the type of research work, generally speaking, which is going on in the executive branch of the Government, but I do want to point out that it is not primarily directed toward the problems which confront the legislative branch of the Government. It is very naturally primarily directed toward the problems which arise after Congress has established the policy, and is related, very naturally more directly to the administrative problems which are involved.

QUESTION AS TO COMBINING LEGISLATIVE AND EXECUTIVE RESEARCH

Senator TYDINGS. Would you think it would be possible to combine the legislative and the executive research all under one head and save money?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Senator, I doubt if there would be any saving of money, and I think that the whole point of the necessity for legislative reference service would be lost if it were merged with the executive arm of the Government. In such an event research would be certainly directed toward the problems with which the administrative branch of the Government is confronted.

Senator ADAMS. The executive branch of the Government has millions and millions of dollars to spend every year in its research work. It has a cabinet minister provided with unlimited funds for that.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. That is all true, Senator. There are two basic problems of research which relate to the respective problems confronting the legislative branch of the Government and the executive branch of the Government. This is a very modest sum to be provided which will be, I am certain, of immense value to individual Members of Congress and to the committees of Congress.

PURPOSE OF LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE SERVICE

Senator CHAVEZ. Will you pardon me there a moment? As I get your point, it is your idea that the legislative reference service now with the Library of Congress should be for the legislative branch of the Government only, in order to keep it from interfering or suggesting things that would interfere with executive functions so that we could determine ourselves either as to policy after this research has been made——

Senator LA FOLLETTE (interposing). And that it will make available this vast amount of information which is in the Library of Congress, but which no Senator or Member of the House has the time, in connection with his other duties, to go over and do the necessary job of combing the source material and relating it to specific problems.

Senator CHAVEZ. Congressional problcm?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Legislative problems.

EXTRACT FROM HOUSE REPORT

Senator ADAMS. May I suggest that while you are making this statement you might comment on the statement of the report of the House in which they say:

"If Congress needs the services of research experts along the lines indicated in addition to those that are already to be found in the Federal Service, there is a serious question as to whether those experts should be a part of the Library of Congress."

Senator LA FOLLETTE. My answer to that comment is, in the first place, the Library of Congress, because of its other activities, gathers together and has available this material. The legislative reference service has been established there, and I believe, although not sufficiently equipped to do the job that it could do, those various Members of Congress who have availed themselves of its service have found it very useful.

Senator ADAMS. In the past some of us have rather questioned whether they would regard it as the Library, of course. I think the progress we are making is to give it that practical recognition.

Senator TYDINGS. What was that, Senator?

Senator ADAMS. Give practical recognition to the Library of Congress instead of merely a title.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. I think if I could say so without embarrassment to the present Librarian, I have complete confidence that under his administration, if this money is provided, we will find this service will be administered in a way to be extremely helpful to Members of Congress.

LEGISLATIVE RESOURCES OF NATIONAL LIBRARY

I would like to quote briefly from a statement which my father made in an editorial in La Follette's Weekly for July 4, 1914 [reading]:

"The Library of Congress is a great storehouse of information on subjects of legislation. Its collections of the laws and government reports of all countries are probably unequaled anywhere in the world, but at present the valuable material which they maintain can scarcely be said to be practically available. At great cost, the accumulated wisdom and experience of all civilized governments has been assembled here, and here session after session it lies untouched, because it is in no form for immediate use. Interpreted, classified, briefed, ready for the industrious legislator, it will enable Congress to profit by the trials, experiments, and approved judgments of all other nations. In short, the aim of the new provision is to make serviceable in suitable form for immediate use the legislative resources of our national library. By adopting it Congress has taken an important and necessary step toward rendering the business of lawmaking more efficient, more exact, economically sound, and scientific."

This excerpt from my father's editorial expresses better than I could hope to do my concept of what this service should be, but, as stated previously, Congress has never seen fit to properly staff and equip the legislative reference service. I think that the recommendations in the estimate give every assurance that the service will be properly equipped if the money is appropriated.

IMPORTANCE OF RESEARCH

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that it is my firm conviction that the problems confronting the Government under the democratic process are staggering; that we must move in the direction of equipping the representatives of the people with the necessary data, information, and available material in order that they may more successfully cope with the complex problems that confront us. I make the appeal that this committee will give careful and, I hope, favorable consideration to this item, because I regard it as one of great importance for the future work of the Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill, H. R. 8913, was read the third time, and passed.

REIMBURSEMENT OF COTTON COOPERATIVES

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 802, Senate bill 2585, to reimburse the cotton cooperative associations for losses occasioned by the Federal Farm Board's stabilization operations, and for other purposes. This is a bill in which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is interested.

Mr. McKELLAR obtained the floor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. KING. I understood the Senator from California had given notice that he intended to address the Senate this morning.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection to the Senator from California proceeding.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from California said he wanted to speak at about 2 o'clock. He can speak on the bill, on the motion to take it up, or on anything else.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may we have some semblance of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order so that business may be transacted.

Mr. McNARY. I was advised early today that the able Senator from California does not desire to address the Senate today.

Mr. DOWNEY. No, Mr. President, I do desire to address the Senate today.

Mr. McNARY. I was misinformed. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from California has expressed his desire to address the Senate today, and he can now address the Senate either on the motion to consider the bill or upon the merits of the bill, although he probably does not desire to discuss the measure. The Senator can proceed now, if he wishes, on the motion that is pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the parliamentary situation. The Senator from Kentucky has moved to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2585, being Calendar No. 802, to reimburse the cotton cooperative associations for losses occasioned by the Federal Farm Board's stabilization operations, and for other purposes. That motion is not debatable in the morning hour.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, has the Chair announced that the morning business has been concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business was concluded some time ago, but the Senate is still in the morning hour.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the morning hour be considered to have been concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What the Chair understood was that the Senator previously asked that the calling of the Calendar be dispensed with.

Mr. BARKLEY. I meant to ask unanimous consent to dispense with the calling of the Calendar, and I thought then that the Chair announced that the morning hour was concluded. Therefore, it does not make any difference whether it is 1 o'clock or any other hour; if the morning hour is concluded the Senate can consider any business it desires to take up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a difference between the morning hour and morning business.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the morning hour and the business coming under it be considered to have been concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, is it possible by unanimous consent to change the time of day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule has been dispensed with by unanimous consent. The motion of the Senator from Kentucky is before the Senate, and is now debatable. The Chair recognizes the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of placing a certain matter in the RECORD?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

REAPPORTIONMENT OF DELEGATES TO THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, at the last national convention of the Democratic Party held in Philadelphia, Pa., I had the honor to be the chairman of the committee on rules and order of business. In that capacity I presented to the convention a report from that committee unanimously adopted by the committee, providing for the abolition of the two-thirds rule in the national Democratic conventions, and a resolution directing the Democratic National Committee to consider and report to the next national convention a proposal for reapportionment of delegates to the national Democratic conventions, on the theory that a weighted system of representation should be established to give fuller recognition to those portions of the country which are more or less permanently Democratic.

That resolution carried the mandate from the Democratic National Convention, because, following the unanimous report of the committee, it was adopted by the Democratic National Convention. Whether or not anything has ever been done by the Democratic National Committee to carry out that mandate, I do not know. If so, it has never been made known to the public, although I have myself two or three times communicated with the Democratic National Committee authorities calling attention to the existence of that mandate of the last national convention, with the provision that the committee be required to report to the next national convention.

I ask to insert in the RECORD as part of my remarks at this point a Memorandum on the Need of a Reapportionment of Delegates to the Democratic National Conventions, prepared by John Temple Graves II, one of the leading publicists of the South, connected with the Birmingham Age-Herald and the Birmingham News, and whose articles are syndicated through a large number of newspapers in the South.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The memorandum is as follows:

MEMORANDUM ON THE NEED OF A REAPPORTIONMENT OF DELEGATES TO THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONVENTIONS

Along with the resolution to abolish the two-thirds rule for making nominations, the Democratic National Convention of 1936 passed the following resolution, which, like the other, was prepared by the committee on rules and order of business:

"Be it resolved, That the Democratic National Committee is hereby instructed to formulate and to recommend to the next national convention a plan for improving the system by which delegates and alternates to Democratic National Conventions are apportioned; and be it further

"Resolved, That in formulating this plan the national committee shall take into account the Democratic strength within each State, District of Columbia, and Territory, etc., in making said apportionment."

It was generally understood that the proposed new apportionment system would serve to recompense the South somewhat for loss of the two-thirds rule, since the South is the region of greatest continuous Democratic strength, and a system of representation based in part on such strength would be expected to increase the comparative number of southern delegates to national conventions of the party.

The best way of expressing the situation against which the South is entitled to remedy is that it gives to the State of Pennsylvania, which only rarely goes Democratic, enough votes in Democratic National Conventions (72) to outvote the almost always Democratic southern States of Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina combined (Virginia has 22 votes, North Carolina 26, and South Carolina 16, a total of 64). Another extremely eloquent way of expressing it is that a district in Vermont, which is the least Democratic State, has exactly the same number of votes in the party's national conventions as does a district in South Carolina, which is the most Democratic State. Still another is that a district in which there existed no single Democratic voter would have as much weight in the party conventions as at present composed as would a district in which every vote was Democratic.

This unfairness in apportionment results from the fact that representation is based, for the most part, on the total population rather than on the Democratic population of the different States and districts. That is to say, it is based on representation in Congress. Each congressional district is given two votes in the party's national conventions and there are four votes from the State at large.

The Republican Party is actually more democratic than the Democratic Party in this matter of giving representation on a basis in part of party strength. Until 1912 it had the present Democratic system. In that year the quarrel between William Howard Taft and Theodore Roosevelt resulted partly from the part southern delegations played in the nomination of Taft. The injustice of giving full representation to Southern States which never did or would go Republican became so plain after the party split that a new apportionment system was used in 1916. The new system was amended somewhat in 1924 but its original principle was preserved. Today it is, roughly, as follows:

(1) Each congressional district is given 1 vote.

(2) An additional vote is given to each congressional district which gave the party as many as 10,000 votes in the preceding Presidential or congressional election.

(3) Each State is given 2 votes (two delegates at large).

(4) Three additional votes (delegates at large) are given each State which cast its electoral vote or a majority thereof for the party nominee in a preceding Presidential election.

This is how it happens today that even though the States of Tennessee and Alabama have 22 votes each in Democratic national conventions, Tennessee's greater number than Alabama's results from the fact that she has more Republicans, that Republicans cast more than 10,000 votes in 1936 or 1938 in 5 of her 9 congressional districts.

A result of the Republican Party's system is to cost the South votes in Republican national conventions. That is as it should be. It would be ridiculous to say that South Carolina, which never goes Republican, should be allowed to outvote in Republican conventions the combined States of Vermont and New Hampshire which nearly always go Republican. It is as ridiculous as it is to say that those two Republican States should have equal representation with South Carolina in Democratic conventions.

The same new system which cost the South votes in Republican conventions would increase the South's votes in Democratic conventions. If the Democrats had the Republicans' system, the South would have a bonus of 147 votes in Democratic conventions—composed of an additional delegate from each of its 111 congressional districts and 3 additional delegates at large from each of its 12 States. The original base total would be lower, of course, and other regions would have bonuses, too, but the South's proportion would obviously be greatly increased.

Under the Republican system, too, the fact that the South does not bring its full Democratic voting strength to the general election polls (because of the controlling Democratic primaries and because, too, of the poll tax) would not prevent an increase in southern representation at party conventions. Little as it comes up to real Democratic strength, the Democratic vote at general elections runs far ahead of the 10,000 needed to qualify for an additional delegate. In the Presidential election of 1936, for example, the average Democratic vote per district in Alabama was 26,466; Arkansas, 20,952; Florida, 49,823; Georgia, 25,537; Louisiana, 36,613; Mississippi, 22,474; North Carolina, 56,013; South Carolina, 18,965; Tennessee, 36,342; Texas, 34,975; and Virginia, 26,109. As a matter of fact, if the Republican system should be adopted by the Democrats, it would be better from the South's point of view to amend it to the extent of requiring 15,000 rather than 10,000 party votes to qualify for an extra district delegate. That would let all the southern districts in and would disqualify more of the other districts.

It may be said against the benefit to the South of new apportionment on this basis that every State in the Union, saving only Maine and Vermont, went Democratic in the last Presidential election, and therefore that an apportionment based on party strength in the different States and districts as indicated in that election would not help the South's proportion much. But the election in 1940 is obviously going to be no such landslide. It is going to be much more normal in the relative distribution of votes between the two parties, and the South's strength in the Democratic Party is by that token going to be more in evidence. And it is upon the election returns of 1940 that any reapportionment enacted by the Democratic convention of 1940 will have to be based.

The foregoing memorandum is taken from the thinking and writings of John Temple Graves 2d, associate editor of the Birmingham News and columnist for several southern newspapers. Mr. Graves has studied the matter carefully and has agitated for reapportionment in a forceful and intelligent manner.

Mr. Graves makes the suggestion that a proper apportionment plan should be as follows:

(1) One delegate from each congressional district.

(2) One additional delegate from each congressional district which either elected a Democratic Congressman or cast no less than 15,000 votes for a Democratic candidate for Congress in the last preceding congressional election.

(3) Four delegates at large from each State.

(4) Three additional delegates at large from each State which cast its electoral vote, or a majority thereof, for the Democratic Presidential election.

THE TOWNSEND PLAN

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, it is my purpose today to present to the Senate as briefly as I can, a résumé of the terms of the new Townsend bill, with a forecast as to its probable workings, and likwise a critical analysis of the operations of the pension provisions of the present Social Security Act.

The Townsend bill itself is so simple in its terms that it can be readily understood by any intelligent child of 16 years of age. And it is not difficult in a very brief period to state its provisions and its probable workings.

But, Mr. President, when one turns to the complicated actuarial features of the present Social Security Act, one enters a field of legislation so conflicting, so abstruse, and complicated, that I venture to say there are not five men in the city of Washington who can give you an adequate description of the terms of that bill. And even to that handful of men the present Social Security Act in its future workings is so vague and hazy that no prophecies can be made with any degree of certainty with respect to it.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, up to date the prophecies of the social-security experts have been proved uniformly invalid by the passage of time.

Let us turn our attention first to the new Townsend bill which has been introduced in the Senate with a companion measure in the House of Representatives. That bill calls for the imposition of a 2-percent tax upon the gross income of all corporations and individuals in the United States and provides that whatever funds be raised by that tax shall be equally distributed among all American citizens who have retired from gainful employment and who are past 60 years of age.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Does the bill to which the Senator has referred exempt the first $250 per month of income?

Mr. DOWNEY. Yes; the bill exempts salaries and wages up to $250 a month, and gross incomes arising from business up to the sum of $3,000 a year.

It is our estimate, Mr. President, that we have in the United States about $365,000,000,000 of gross income that would be subject to the levy of this 2-percent tax before the exemptions are deducted. Those exemptions would amount to about $65,000,000,000, which would leave the sum of $300,000,000,000 subject to a 2-percent tax, which would raise some $6,000,000,000.

There recently have been misleading statements made in the House of Representatives as to the gross income of the United States. Indeed, within the last 2 weeks a most ill-informed statement was presented. I have at this time no particular desire to argue the 2-percent gross-income tax. I desire, however, to place in the RECORD a statement coming from the Department of Commerce showing the gross income in the United States for the calendar year 1936. That statement may be found in volume 1 of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives in 1939, on page 83; and the figures there presented from the Department of Commerce are practically in accordance with the statement I have made.

If this tax would raise the sum of $6,000,000,000, it is expected that its benefits would be claimed by about 10,000,000 of our citizens, which would give to each one of them the sum of $600 a year, or $50 a month. The figures I have given are predicated upon a net national income of $75,000,000,000; and, of course, if and when the national income increased beyond that figure, the allocation to our retired citizens would likewise increase.

Mr. President, it is conservatively estimated that the farms and factories of America could now yield at least $110,000,000,000 of wealth; and if we have the ability and the will ever to restore our people to full employment, of course, the pension would increase materially over the $50 a month which I have indicated; and thereafter, under the Townsend plan, the retired citizens would share equally with the rest of the Nation as the national income and national wealth increased.

I desire to impress upon Senators particularly the fact that not for several years has the Townsend plan called for a payment of $200 a month. There is written in the bill, and there is written in prior bills, the provision that that shall be the maximum amount; but for several years there has been no provision that any such payment shall be guaranteed.

Mr. President, so far as I personally am concerned, the 2-percent gross-income tax is a secondary problem. The question is, considering all the social conditions existing in America, from the standpoint of Christianity, decency, and policy, what proportion of the net national income should we set aside for our retired citizens? If 10,000,000 of our people should claim the benefits of the bill, they would constitute about 8 percent of our national population; and if on a net income of $75,000,000,000 the bill should raise $6,000,000,000, that would be 8 percent of the national income. That is the reason, Mr. President, why we have fashioned the present gross-income tax as we have, with its exemptions, so that it shall, in decency, produce for the retired workers of America something near their fair share of the average income of the Nation. We cannot believe that any Christian civilization can proceed upon any other standard than that the men and women who have created this great industrial structure and this civilization are entitled to their fair and just reward in the declining years of their lives.

Mr. President, perhaps the most important respect in which the Townsend plans differs from the present Social Security Act is that it provides pensions for persons more than 60 years of age. The present Social Security Act leaves millions upon millions of our people between 60 and 65 years of age, without savings and without hope of a job, living precarious, miserable years from 60 to 65.

The Gallup poll has shown that 87 percent of our citizens believe the age limit should be dropped to 60 years. In the face of that declaration by the American people, which is common knowledge to us all, how dare we fail to obey the mandate, the common-sense wish of our people?

Let me point out to the members of the Finance Committee that whenever the age limit shall be dropped from 65 to 60, out the window must go all the astronomical actuarial calculations of the Social Security Board; for those calculations, made by thousands of men, involving millions of pages of typewriting, are based upon an actuarial system contrary to reality, contrary to decency, and contrary to the wish and the will of the American people.

Mr. President, any government which desires to maintain itself in power should soon hear the almost unanimous voice of the people of America demanding that persons more than 60 years of age shall be given annuities or pensions of some kind or other.

Mr. President, is it not strange that we spend all our ingenuity making great machines to oust men from work, to create more wealth; we steadily make it more and more difficult for persons past 60 to obtain any job; and then we neglect and refuse to give to retired workers the means of buying the abundance which those machines, manned with younger workers, could so bountifully produce? Not only our industrial and social realities but our political realities demand that the age limit shall be dropped from 65 to 60.

That is the first important respect in which the Townsend bill differs from the present Security Act.

What is the next important difference? Well, the proposed bill would provide about $600 a year for a retired worker. Fifty dollars a month is not very much to live upon. Probably few of us could believe that a man and his wife could live upon that amount. Certainly no one would say it is too high. I ask Senators to review the unchristian, indecent amounts paid under the present Social Security Act; and I challenge contradiction when I state they are grossly insufficient. Millions of words have gone forth from the Social Security Board misleading and deluding the older people of America into the belief that at last their anguished hearts were to have some relief and they were to be provided enough to live on.

There are two basic provisions in the Social Security Act: First, the Federal-State matching plan; and, second, old-age insurance, the contributory plan. Considering all the pension recipients together, they average about the sum of $4 a week for each one; and we, in the wealthiest land of the whole world, we who love to boast to other nations of our generosity and our bounty, are content to run our factories and machines at 50- or 60-percent capacity and point to the payment of pensions of $4 a week as a generous Christian act.

Mr. President, in the past year I have received tens of thousands of letters from anguished hearts and miserable homes, from men and women who have helped to build the wealth upon which the rest of us live, who now, in their declining years, are facing conditions so intolerable and so terrible that many of them take the short suicide route to escape, and many of them die of broken hearts. I can prove it by my correspondence if proof is desired.

Mr. President, generalities and figures do not mean very much. Let us reduce the problem to one concrete case. Let us take a typical case under the social-security law to see why it is that contributory workers in America are not applying for these pensions. Because, Mr. President, that is the truth—the prophecies made by the Social Security Board that a certain number of applications would be filed and a certain amount of money would go out are not being fulfilled. In other words, the Social Security Act today is of such negligible importance that we may say that it is practically worthless so far as the great bulk of the American people are concerned.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. The able Senator refers to the Social Security Board. Perhaps it might better be referred to as the Social Insecurity Board. I voted against the present Social Security Act. I exposed its fallacies. On the day after its passage I denounced this social insecurity and demanded its repeal. I then called attention to the fact that action must be by the National Government and not by States—that funds should be collected by the United States of America and disbursed under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution. These principles are fundamental and must stand. Any other course will lead to disaster. There is yet time to mend our failures by constructive legislation.

Mr. DOWNEY. I thank the Senator, and he is correct, for it is insecurity; it is not security. But in the misleading and delusive columns of newspaper propaganda that have gone forth to the aged people of America from the Social Security Board they have been led to believe that the Social Security Act is a generous, effective law, when, as a matter of cold fact, it is a futile, impotent instrument of poverty and neglect.

In the preparation of their propaganda the Social Security Board has issued this placard which I am now exhibiting. I secured this from one of the streetcar companies of Washington. It is the picture of a happy-looking man, I suppose of 65 years of age, expecting that he is soon to come into relief and security through his annuities under the Social Security Act. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, if we could bring before the Senate the portraits of those men whom this picture is supposed to represent, their faces would mirror anguish, despair, fatigue, and insecurity as they seek and fail to find any relief in present pension laws.

Let me discuss the typical case, Mr. President; let us take the average man; let us not descend into the inferno of those unfortunates living in the jungles, sleeping on gratings in the streets, existing in misery in the poorhouses and old-age farms. Let us take a fortunate case; let us take the average case of an employed worker and see what the Social Security Act does for him.

Mr. President, in the covered occupations reported to the Social Security Board, the average earning was almost exactly, though not quite, $900 a year—$890, to be exact—let us say $75 a month. Eighty-seven percent of those men who are married when they become 65 have wives under 65. These will receive no additional benefit. As a matter of fact, the average age of the average wife is about 5 years younger than her husband at that age.

Here, then, is the average American citizen who has helped to build our homes and stores, to construct our railroads and our highways, who has helped to create the abundance of this Nation by sweat and toil in his working years. He has reached 65; he is filled with delight at the thought that his Government is going to assist him and that he and his wife are to receive security and care from then on. So he goes to the Social Security Board and says, "I am married; I shall be 65 this January 1; my wife is 60. I have been employed for 3 years, making $75 a month. How much am I entitled to?"

The Social Security expert says, "Well, that is easy. Take your average earnings of $75; we give you 40 percent upon the first $50, or $20; we give you 10 percent upon the second $25, or $2.50 additional. So you will receive $22.50, plus 1 percent of that amount for each year, which for 3 years would make it about $23."

Mr. President, I sometimes think that most men who have led easy lives, most men who have been insulated against the tribulations of adversity, know but little of the great common heart of America, and the suffering and problems of our people, because the Social Security Board in its figures to the Finance Committee prophesied to the Finance Committee, in effect, that the great majority of the men thus making $75 a month would retire at 65 and live on the $23 a month.

Mr. President, have these gentlemen ever stopped to ask themselves how men can do that? Apparently not, for they are now surprised that men are not retiring, and when they send out their social-security experts to investigate—to Mike or Jim or Bill, they seem surprised to learn that 19 times out of 20 the worker will say "Mr. Social Security Expert, I have not $1 of insurance or of savings or of property and I simply cannot exist with my wife on $23 a month. As a matter of fact, the Social Security Board members should not be surprised, for their records show that of the men working at 65, earning $75 a month, 19 out of 20 of them have no savings or insurance.

As a matter of sad fact they are generally in debt two or three hundred dollars.

And the records of the Social Security Board itself show that 19 out of 20 of the men in that class have no children upon whom they can thrust themselves and gain anything thereby. Their descent upon the homes of their relatives cruelly burdens those homes and brings no relief to them. Oh, yes; many of them may go into homes already struck by poverty; many of them may bring greater misery and insecurity into the lives of their children; but the harsh fact is, Mr. President, that 50 percent of the workers of America cannot help their parents, and those are the very parents who need help.

Let us see, Mr. President, how absolutely meaningless, how absolutely worthless is this $23 a month to the elderly citizen. I take now the typical case developed by the Social Security Board figures themselves. Mike and his wife pay $20 a month for their rent; and they have a most modest home for that rental. Their food costs them another $20 a month. Mike spends $5 a month on streetcar fare. He is paying $15 a month upon dental and medical and other bills. He has about $10 a month left for clothing and recreation and newspapers and telephone. As a matter of fact, he cannot live on that $75 a month, counting the unforeseen items of sickness, dental, and medical attention and other unforeseen burdens.

Yes, Mr. President, we may degrade him down into a home in the slums that he might rent for $14 or $15 or $16 a month; we might slowly starve him and his wife by malnutrition by cutting their food allowance down, perhaps, to $15 or $16 a month; but that man and his wife cannot possibly live upon that $23 a month. Hence, I say to the distinguished Senator who honors me here with his presence, the chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. HARRISON], if and when he attempts to reappraise and reexamine the workings of the Social Security Act, he will find that the money the Social Security Board promised would be disbursed is not being expended, because men who are earning $75 a month cannot retire and live on $22 or $23 a month. They cannot even slowly starve to death upon that amount, but their starvation would be rapid, indeed.

Mr. President, I wish I could bring before the Senate a composite of the hundreds of thousands of letters which are now in our records, and in the records of the Townsend organization, reciting the history and the misery of the retired people of America. Less than 20 percent of those past 60 now have jobs. About 15 percent have savings. All the rest of them are thrust into a precarious and insecure existence in a land of superabundant wealth.

Well, you ask me, what are the aged people of America going to do? I reply, if there is any Senator here who can answer that question, I wish he would rise and declare himself.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DOWNEY. I do.

Mr. LUNDEEN. He might transfer himself to the mercies of the Surplus Commodities Corporation, which has recently sent food to some of our citizens, valued at 1 cent, and in some instances, 1½ cents per meal per person. See W. P. A. reports. All they get, I understand, is some old apples, onions, and inferior flour. That might make a good text for some totalitarian dictator. What a grand standard of living for a democracy.

DR. FRANCIS E. TOWNSEND

Dr. Townsend will live in history. He stirred a Nation to its very depths by his fervent appeals. For years we liberals and progressives appealed to our fellow citizens for social-security legislation. Dr. Townsend did more than all of us—he made us social-security minded. He talked not only old-age pensions—he advocated recovery legislation, and there must be sane and sensible recovery legislation—recovery before it is too late. Hats off to Dr. Townsend and the mighty host he leads onward to paths of progress and prosperity.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, it is true that Mike may go to his State and receive from his State an allocation for a portion of the charity pension if the charity pension is greater than what we call old-age insurance. And that brings us to another weird provision of the Security Act.

As I have already indicated, we have two pension phases of the present law. We have the contributory system, under which the worker is now paying 1 percent upon his wages, and his employer an equal amount, which amount will finally be raised to a total of 6 percent. We have the matching plan, under which the pensions are given as a matter of charity, the Federal Government matching the State payments up to $20 a month. Now, let us see just how strangely these plans work out when compared to each other.

The Federal Government has created a system in which, in almost one-half the States, the amount that a man may get as a matter of charity under the matching plan is greater than the amount the Government gives him under the plan which involves taxing his wages. In other words, in many States—New York, Ohio, I am not sure of Michigan, but many, many States—the amount of money which is paid out as a matter of governmental subsidy substantially exceeds the amount of money paid out on old-age insurance based on contributions.

Not only that, Mr. President, but think of this: The man whose wages are taxed, if he is married and his wife is past 65, will have his allotment increased 50 percent, while if he receives a pension as a matter of charity it will be doubled. If the man dies his wife will get 100 percent under the matching plan, the charity plan; but if he dies, under the contributory plan the wife, for some strange reason, will receive only 75 percent of the amount.

Mr. President, think to what an end we have come in the State of California. Here is the Social Security Board setting up a vast actuarial scheme to determine the pensions workers in California will receive 25, 50, yes 100 years from now; and the amount that the workers in California will receive 50 years from now under the actuarial plan is exceeded by 97 percent in the case of those now receiving charity payments. In California, the pension State, we give a single man $40. If he is married we give him $80. If he is married and his wife is past 65, under the contributory plan he will generally get around $25 or $35 a month.

Mr. President, I have talked to some persons who have seen the files of the Social Security Board at Baltimore. They tell me they never could have conceived that there could be so many files in existence. A young boy from California wrote me. He was 15 years of age. He had started to work in a covered occupation. The Social Security Board has his card, and for 50 years the Social Security Board intends to keep track of his earnings. Fifty years from now, under the actuarial scheme, it is going to allocate him less at the very maximum than we now pay as a matter of governmental subsidy in California.

Think again, Mr. President: If that boy of 15 should ultimately marry a wife 15 years younger than he, who should live to be 85, that would mean that the Social Security Board have in the present determined by an involved actuarial scheme what that widow will receive one century from now. What omniscience!

Why, Mr. President, if anybody can look back over the past 20 years, with its blood and destruction and dynamic changes; with its ever-increasing tempo of production; and then with its ever more potent machines, believe he can work out a plan that will successfully determine from wage payments over the next decades what wage earners and their widows will be paid 25, 50, 75, or 100 years from now, I must admit he has more confidence in his intellectual processes than I have in mine.

Mr. President, let us go back for a minute to the typical case we have been discussing—the man making $75 a month. Let us see what he is going to do; and if there is a Senator here who can give him a message as to how he should live from now on, I should like to be able to bear some hope and encouragement to that man, because this is what his letter tells me is happening to him:

Let us take the case of a man who is a janitor, we will say, in a private school, earning $75 a month. He is beginning to get tired and ailing. He has worked since he was 15 or 18 years of age. His heart begins to bother him when he works vigorously, when he arises early in the morning in the cold and the darkness. The spring has left his limbs; his vitality has begun to fail. He is subject to sickness and dizzy spells. The doctor has told him he has to stop working so hard. The truth is, he has worked for this civilization of ours for 50 years. Now he is old and tired and ailing. He is entitled to rest and a serene retirement. A younger man ought to take his job. But poor Mike's days are not filled with the hope of a happy and dignified retirement—only with worry for fear he may lose his job. He suffers from insomnia at night as the specters of insecurity thrust themselves upon him, and he says to himself, "What would happen to my wife if I should die tomorrow?" And sometimes, in the gloom and fear of the night, he figures that he will do what tens of thousands of old persons do every year in the United States—kill himself. And in despair he questions, "What will happen to my wife if I do?" And he thinks, "Well, maybe she can go out to the county poor farm." So Mike takes a trip out to that dismal abode of hell, and he sees what Mrs. Roosevelt saw, what Mrs. Roosevelt should have known she would see, because you can see the same fearful, tragic sights in 9 out of 10 old-age homes and poor farms in the United States, where hundreds of thousands of persons who have been loyal, decent American citizens now exist in tragic decay that is worse than death itself. But Mike clutches at the hope that the county poor farm would be a haven for his widow if he should pass on; and he goes out, and he sees a plain building like a cantonment. He walks in over a plain pine board floor, unvarnished, with 20 or 30 beds on one side of the room and 20 or 30 beds on the other side. And there he sees to what unhappy fate his own wife may come if he should die or lose his job. As he steps into that room he is met with the nauseating odor that comes from the uncared-for bodies of human beings. And he sees the meager food those poor, doomed persons are given, in this land where food is destroyed. He sees all the tragedy of the indigent aged. Let us not paint further that tragic picture, but when the husband has seen it, he knows that if he leaves this world he would better take his wife along with him than let her go out there.

Mr. President, I realize that these are not pleasant subjects to discuss. It is much nicer to put them behind us, and think of our generosity to foreign nations, our wealth, and our great achievements. Nevertheless, there are millions upon millions of American citizens anguished and insecure not knowing where they can turn, who can think only of their own tragic plight and look only to us for relief.

And what I have said I repeat, if there is one Senator who knows how the aged of America can exist under the Social Security Act, let him tell how a man earning $75 a month and supporting a wife, can retire and take this $22.50 or $23, because the Social Security Board is now met with that very problem. And, sadly enough, they do not know how to solve it. All this vast actuarial scheme means almost nothing. For almost no money of any considerable amount is going out, because men who are working and making hardly enough on which to live cannot retire and take one-third or one-fourth of that insufficient amount.

But perhaps some of my colleagues are saying, "Will not some of them get more than $22.50 a month?" Oh, yes, Mr. President; some of them will and do. Some of them get $40 a month, plus 3 percent on that for 3 years, or $41.20 a month. Who are those fortunate people thus comparatively blessed under this strange, weird law? They are the people who are making upward of $250 a month. In other words, if one has been a wage earner at $250, $500, $1,000, or $10,000 a month, the Government will pay him a monthly pension of $41.20. If he should die and leave a widow and four children, they would be so fortunate as to get $85 a month. Consider the cruel machinations of this law. As I shall show later, the money that is paid out does not come from the workers' contributions to any substantial extent. This annuity plan will be financed chiefly by public money, as I shall demonstrate later. The Social Security Board now knows it. While in the hearings before the Finance Committee they argued to the members of the committee that this was a contributory plan, they now have dropped all pretense of that and admit it is not a contributory plan, but they justify it in this way: "Hereafter we are going to pay pensions in America whose amount will be determined by the amount of the earnings," not by the amount of contributions, but, I repeat, by the amount of the earnings.

Mr. President, I have here the reports of the Social Security Board, showing that for the next 20 years the amount of contributions paid by a worker would not by any appreciable amount contribute to the sum that is to be disbursed to him. Think of it for a moment. An employee at the present is being taxed 1 percent of his pay, and that rule holds for the past 3 years and the coming 3 years. It means that for those six years a man getting $3,000 a year would pay in only $180, and his annuity would be valued by an insurance company as worth about $10,000. As a matter of fact, the tables of the Social Security Board show that the annuities which will be earned by the workers will be paid almost wholly from public funds.

Mr. President, the question is asked, How will this system ultimately work? How much of the pensions will flow from public sources; how much from the worker's contributions? The advisory council of the Social Security Board plans that ultimately the cost be met in approximately equal shares by employers, employees, and the Federal Government.

So that the Social Security Board itself estimates that, looking ahead, say, 20 or 25 years, when the plan is fully in operation, only one-third of the annuities disbursed will come from the contributions of the workers themselves. The rest will come either from an employers' tax, which becomes a consumptive tax, or from Federal deficit appropriations.

These figures would seem to indicate that to the extent of at least one-third these annuities would be financed by the workers' contributions. But let me call attention to the fact that the workers who pay in that one-third do not comprise all of the ones who get the money. And why do I say that? Here is something which should interest to the very heart the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance, because under this strange law, while we tax workers receiving less than $200 a year, we do not pay them anything at all. We take their money but we exclude them from all benefits. In other words, what this strange, undemocratic, cruel law does is to take the most unfortunate, submerged groups in America, the low-paid and the part-time workers, many of whom are doing the hard, dirty work of the world, who cannot make $200 a year in money income, and we tax their hundred dollars, or $150, or $199, and, having added their contributions to this great fund, we then deny them all benefits and pay out their money to the workers who have been permanently employed and have received higher incomes.

I stated to the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee that this argument should penetrate to his heart, because about 50 percent of the workers in Mississippi receive less than $200 a year. So we have the strange spectacle under this law of the money being drained out of the farm areas and the poorer States to pay workers' contributions in the wealthier regions and the wealthier States. The figures I have given to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] hold true, though to a lesser degree, in all the other States in the South and in all the farm areas, including the State of Nebraska. The great industrial, wealthy States and cities will profit immensely by this law. The poorer rural regions suffer immeasurably.

I will make a remark which might seem exaggerated, but I make it after months of deliberation: If Thaddeus Stevens, with all his talent and vengeful fury of reconstruction days, had desired to degrade and pauperize the South, he could not have worked out with his clever mind an apter constitutional way of doing it than through the contributory plan of the Social Security Act.

I have stated to the Senate that old-age insurance would pauperize the farm States, the Southern States, the poorer States, to the advantage of the wealthy States.

Let us take one case to see why that is true. Take the State of Michigan, which is at the top because of its great body of factory and automobile workers. In the State of Michigan approximately 50 percent of the workers between 15 and 65 years of age pay contributions. In the Southern States the number runs to 12, 14, 15, or 16 percent. Consequently, in the great industrial States of the Nation about four times as many workers are subject to the terms of the act as in the farm regions and the Southern States.

Let us pass on to the next factor. In Michigan—and Michigan is to be congratulated on it—only about 15 percent of the workers receive less than $200 a year. Consequently, 85 percent of those who pay contributions will receive pensions.

As I stated, in the State of Mississippi one-half the workers receive approximately less than $200 a year, and of the pitiful percentage in Mississippi who pay contributions, only about 7 percent of the total population of the State will be paid annuities. So that the law works out in this way: Out of funds that are principally coming from public sources, $7 per inhabitant will go to Michigan for $1 per capita which will go to the State of Mississippi. I may say that South and North Dakota are deprived equally with the Southern States in that respect, and I have the figures here to show anyone who may desire to see them.

Mr. President, let me return to the point I was making a while ago. While, as a matter of fact, the Social Security Board now estimates that ultimately one-third of the money paid out to annuitants will come from the contributions of the workers, those figures must be qualified in this way: That amount includes the contribution from the partially employed and the low-income group, so that one can safely say that in the State of Michigan not 20 percent of the money which is paid out in annuities will come from the contributions of the workers receiving the annuities. In other words, if the Social Security Act is maintained upon its present actuarial base, this plan will remain 80 percent a social-dividend plan—a social-dividend plan under which we will disburse $5 and $10 to the wealthy State for every $1 for the poorer State.

Let me say, Mr. President, if there are Senators here who hold dear their farm population, in States which have both city and farm population, the Social Security Act will do this: For every dollar that will go into the rural regions, $10 or $20 will go into the city regions. In other words, I might say to the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], whose high intelligence I have always admired, that if in Michigan certain counties are purely farm and rural, as compared with Detroit, on a per capita basis, Detroit under the contributary plan of old-age insurance will get $10 or $20 for every dollar paid out in the farm regions.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Since the able Senator has been kind enough to address himself to me, I should like to make an observation. I am somewhat familiar with the intricacies and the inadequacies of the Social Security Act, to which the Senator is so ably referring. In many aspects I agree with him in his strictures. I think that in the long view it is going to be utterly impossible to satisfy the security demands of the American people with the Social Security Act, in its present prospectus; and I am completely convinced that the Senator is correct to the extent that just so soon as the resources can be safely provided to do it, without upsetting our general recovery, pensions, as a matter of right to the senior citizens of the United States, are, and should be, inevitable.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I, of course, need not say how happy that remark makes me, coming, as it does, from one of the distinguished statesmen of America.

I want to say now that, while my attack upon the social-security law is a rather critical one, I have no criticism to make of either the House committee or the Senate committee. Many of the points which are now developing were not foreseen even by the social-security experts. It was an involved and complicated subject, and I know that every Senator and every Representative took this law believing that it was the best law that could be provided at that time.

But, Mr. President, I am compelled to say further, that the Social Security Board now is actually taking the position that, regardless of money coming from contributions, we must set up a plan in the United States under which what are virtually social dividends will be disbursed in the inverse order of the need of the recipients.

I approach this question now in the hope that I can make myself clear to the Senators who are kind enough to listen to me, but this is an involved and abstruse subject, and a person can fully understand the Security Act only after months of study, and even then there remain many uncertainties. But I desire to make this point clear, and if there is any Senator who differs with my view I would invite his participation in the discussion, so that what is the viewpoint of the Social Security Board may be frankly defended and discussed.

In the first place, Mr. President, as I have already endeavored to show, the contributory plan has degenerated into a scheme of social dividends under which the workers will receive 80 percent of their annuities from public sources. The Social Security Board defends such a policy. Tacitly admitting that the contributory plan is a social-dividends plan, they say, nevertheless, we should give out benefit in the inverse order of the need of the recipients. That is my characterization of their policy.

I think it is a fair one, because they propose to give out substantial annuities to the groups at the top and miserable and meager payments to the groups at the bottom.

Let me read to the Senate their last statement on this subject, and Senators will notice in this statement they have abandoned all pretense that this is a contributory plan. Let me quote from their own publication:

> The Social Security Act laid upon the Board an administrative responsibility probably unparalleled in the history of social insurance—the responsibility for devising a system applicable to millions of workers whereby each person who qualifies for benefits receives an amount determined by his individual wages in the covered employment.
> It has been generally accepted that the relation of benefits to earnings reflects American traditions and provides for adjustments to the wide differences in the wage scales and living standards within the Nation.

The Board has dropped all pretense that payments are to be proportionate to contributions, and now finds the index of amount of benefit solely in earnings.

I have the honor to have present several Senators from the South. I want to know: Are they willing to accept that standard, under which $5 or $10 will flow into the more prosperous industrial communities in the North as compared to every $1 that they will receive in their States?

Mr. President, that is the position of the Social Security Board, for its members believe that we must perpetuate in America in retirement a caste system. If a man has been harassed and driven by low wages and unemployment during his working years, he may be entirely excluded from benefits or handed $10 or $12 a month; but if he had been so fortunate as to have had steady employment and to earn $250, $500, or $1,000 a month, then we will give his widow and his orphans $85 a month.

Mr. President, is it possible that that is the viewpoint of the Chief Executive of the United States? I do not know, but he should speedily declare himself, for it is the viewpoint of the Social Security Board, whose members are appointed by him.

Is it possible that it is the viewpoint of the Senate or the House of Representatives? I cannot believe it.

Mr. President, it happens that in the past 2 months two clients of mine died in the State of California. I should like to tell about them. One of them was a man of high ability, who died worth perhaps $2,000,000 or $3,000,000. At the time of his death he was a comparatively young man and was receiving a salary of about $50,000 a year. He left a wife and three or four young children. The wife and children will now be paid $85 a month until the children reach the age of 16 or 18, and thereafter, when the wife shall reach the age of 65, she will receive three-quarters of the primary annuity of the husband. That man had paid into the system a total of $90. The annuity will pay his wife and children probably somewhere in the neighborhood of $20,000 to $25,000.

Another client of mine who died was a poor cannery worker, whose steps were always dogged by misfortune, who was always cursed by lack of the opportunity to work. Perhaps he was not as able as some other men, but in a hard world he did the best he could. His average earnings had been $25 a month in covered employment, entitling him to a primary benefit of $10 a month. He, too, left several small children and a widow. The maximum she can receive is double what his primary benefit would have been, or $20 a month. When that husband died probably there was not sufficient food in the house. The children probably had not had sufficient medical care. Their bodies probably lacked soap and decent cleanliness. The family was probably 2 or 3 months behind in its rent. Yet we have worked out a plan which will give to the wealthy widow and children—out of public money, and not out of the contributions of the man himself—a substantial annuity of $85 a month, whereas the woman who needs help desperately will receive $20 a month, or less than a fourth of the amount paid to the wealthy widow.

Mr. President, Senators who are lawyers know that ordinarily the widow of a man who has earned $250, $500, $1,000, or $10,000 a month has the benefit of insurance, property, and savings, and usually there are wealthy relatives. Such a widow has ample protection. Her husband was among the upper 3 percent of the wage earners of America, because we have only that percentage earning upward of $250 a month. Senators also know that when some poor unfortunate in life, earning $25 or $50 a month, dies leaving a widow and small children, usually there is no insurance, and there is no money in the home. There is no property, and there are no savings.

I for one will to my dying day attack and indict this law, which has now degenerated into a scheme of fake social dividends, under which, in democratic America, we now intend to disburse public money in the inverse order of the need of those receiving it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has indicated that, on the average, the contributory system works to the apparent average advantage of the larger industrial States—let us say the wealthier States. But, of course, in the final breakdown, that becames a snare and a delusion, because within the so-called industrial or wealthier States we confront in turn precisely the problem to which the Senator now refers, the horrible discrimination against the less-advantaged and less-privileged people in the States. So, in the final analysis, it is not a problem invidiously between the States. It is a problem invidiously between the citizens themselves, wherever they may live. We have the same problem in Michigan as exists in Mississippi as between the citizens of our own States. Does not the Senator agree to that statement?

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I am in wholehearted agreement upon that question. If I had been able to secure the tables from the Social Security Board, I should have developed the figures showing the difference in the future flow between city and rural annuities; but if the Social Security Board has such figures, at least I have not been able to secure them.

And let me add to what the distinguished Senator from Michigan has said that what happens in the State of Mississippi is vital to us in California and to him in Michigan, because we are one Nation, one people. We shall live and prosper together or finally be all together involved in common national ruin.

Mr. President, as I have previously stated, I wish that I could read one composite letter of the millions which have come in from the older citizens of America. Sitting in Washington, it is difficult to understand what is happening in the great cities, on the farms, and in the factories of America. Marjorie Shearon, in a report to the Social Security Board after an examination, reported that of an average group of 1,000 Americans beyond the age of 65 in 1937, only 128 had current earnings; only 150, or 15 percent, had savings; and only 73 had public or private pensions, while 203 were depending in whole or in part on private or public charity, and 446 were living on the hand-outs of friends and relatives. In short, in a relatively prosperous year at least 14 percent of our senior citizens—and probably more—were gravely in need of Federal benefits.

Mr. President, I shall assume—unless some Senator rises and declares himself in opposition to me—that there is not a single Senator who does not in his heart desire to provide dignity and security of a decent kind for retired workers past 60 years of age. I assume that there is only one question in the minds of Senators, and that is, Can it be done in justice to the other segments of our population? Can it be done without injury to our general economy?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, before taking up my argument where I desisted, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD, at the conclusion of my remarks a copy of gross-income table for 1936, referred to in my main argument; two newspaper articles of a statistical nature, by noted statisticians of America, showing that the burden of non-productive workers upon the productive groups is less now than it has ever been, and that it will be no greater in 1980 than it is at present, or was in 1929. A table showing the average per capita payments to participating earners under the old-age insurance plan by States; and the inscription upon the placard which I have displayed to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matters referred to by the Senator will be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of his remarks.

(See exhibits 1, 2, 3, and 4.)

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Before the Senator resumes his very able argument may I call attention to two books so well written by the able Senator from California on the subjects, "Pensions or Penury?" and "Highways to Prosperity." I ask the attention of the American public to these books from the pen of the learned Senator from the great State of California, and I ask especial attention to the volume, Highways to Prosperity, just now off the press.

Mr. DOWNEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, before the quorum call, I had stated to the Senate that it was my opinion that every Senator, without exception, would be delighted to work out some sort of a pension plan for people past 60, of an adequate nature, if they believed that such a plan could be worked out without injustice to the other segments of our population, and without injury to our economy generally. I myself am confident that that can be done, and I wish now very briefly to advert to certain figures which I gave at the beginning of my argument.

It is our opinion, though it may be subject to a certain amount of change upon further investigation, that a 2-percent gross-income tax on a national income of $75,000,000,000 would raise about $6,000,000,000, which would afford $50 a month for 10,000,000 people past 60.

As I said, 10,000,000 people constitute 8 percent of the population, and $6,000,000,000 is 8 percent of the national income of $75,000,000,000. If a 2-percent gross-income tax would raise 8 percent of the national income, one might logically expect an 8-percent increase in the cost of living to compensate for that tax; but let me show the Senate that that viewpoint overlooks the saving that will be made by this type of pension.

In the first place, the present Social Security Act is levied, roughly, upon almost $30,000,000,000 of pay rolls. In a few years it will be a 6-percent levy, which will raise $1,800,000,000. We are now paying out approximately $400,000,000 in old-age assistance, and we are paying out not less than $300,000,000 more for the benefit of workers on the W. P. A. and others on general relief rolls who are past 60 years of age.

So we may say with certainty that if a general pension law were put into effect we would save about $2,500,000,000 of present and contemplated expenditure under the pension and general relief laws. As a matter of fact, in addition to that we know that hundreds of thousands of workers past 60 would give up their jobs, which probably would make a certain saving in relief and W. P. A.; but I do not count that saving, if any there would be. But assuming a saving of $2,500,000,000, and deducting that from $6,000,000,000, we would have a net increase in the burden of taxation of $3,500,000,000, which would be something less than 5 percent of a national income of $75,000,000,000. Is there one Senator here who, if he believed that a tax which would increase his cost of living by 5 percent would solve this great and serious problem of old-age relief, would not be willing to pay that tax?

Much argument has been made, Mr. President, upon the burden which would be thrown upon the worker by a consumptive tax. Let me now advert to that point.

Under the Townsend bill there is an exemption for salaries up to $250 a month. Consequently, we may say that very probably the worker would not pay very much more in increased cost of living than the pay-roll tax of 3 percent which is designed to be levied by the present Social Security Act against his wages. As a matter of fact, as far as the worker is concerned I think it is wholly illogical to consider that levy upon his consumption as a tax at all. In reality, it is an involuntary form of savings under which he and his family pay into a social fund a volume for which he will receive at least two or three times as much as he would get if he paid the same amount of money into an insurance company; and in lieu of getting his annuity at 65, as under the present act, he would get it at the age of 60, and would escape the worries and hardships incident to the 5 precarious, desperate years between the ages of 60 and 65.

Mr. President, it is true that as far as the more prosperous groups in America are concerned, they would be taxed under this measure much more than under the present law, and they would be substantially taxed. As far as a man making $10,000 a year is concerned, it would cost him in increased living probably 5 percent, or $500 a year; if he had an income of $100,000 that he spent in consumption, it would cost him $5,000; if he were one of our fortunate multimillionaires, with a spending income of $1,000,000 a year, it would cost him $50,000, and the benefit of his payments and those of the prosperous groups in general would go largely to the workers earning less than $250 a month.

What this group of our fortunates must determine, what successful Americans must decide, is whether they are willing to give up by a consumptive tax, by way of an increased cost of living, about 5 percent of their consumption income; and I cannot conceive that there is a single American who, if he believed we could thus pay our great and tragic debt to the retired workers of America, and give them security and peace and dignity, would not be willing to do so.

Mr. President, I may say that this problem of pensions is, in an integral way, tied into the problem of excess savings. I believe that a wise and bountiful pension plan such as that provided by the Townsend bill would so tend to increase prosperity that the added consumptive tax would be absorbed in greater profits and in higher wages. For the purpose of this argument, however, I am not making that contention, although Dr. Townsend primarily conceives his plan to be one of recovery and full employment rather than relief; and I may say that Dr. Townsend, with his genius and his common-sense vision, has anticipated most of the economists in America with his theory on the effect of excess savings, and the need of greater purchasing power among all of our impoverished groups. I shall later consider Dr. Townsend's pension plan from the standpoint of national recovery. But that on some future day.

The argument may be passing through the minds of certain of my auditors, "Yes; while it is true that well-to-do America ought to be willing to tax itself 5 percent upon its living to provide decency and security for our retired workers, what of the rest of the impoverished groups of America? What of the unemployed, the W. P. A., the C. C. C., and the other great groups, desperate and insecure and hungry and unemployed?" Well, Mr. President, if there are Senators here who take the viewpoint that we must continue to live in an economy of scarcity, that we must continue to apportion out poverty, either by way of increasing the national debt or increasing taxes, that is a legitimate argument. If, on the other hand, Senators believe according to the pension philosophy not only that we have in America a sufficiency for all our people, but also that we should have the ability and will to distribute it, the argument ceases to be a legitimate one; for this particular plan will not take $1 from any of the other great groups who are in need. As far as I am concerned, my heart and mind are devoted to any fair and reasonable solution of the problems of all our impoverished groups. I am not concerned solely with our senior citizens; but I do not concede that we must sit here year after year distributing poverty among our people when our farms and factories are now working at little more than half capacity.

So, Mr. President, I should like to drive home this point: If anyone says we cannot afford, under the Townsend bill, to give this amount of wealth to our retired workers, let me say to him that there is no lack of ability in the businessmen of America, in our factories and farms and workers, to produce factory and farm products for the older citizens of America as outlined in the Townsend bill. If there is any lack, it is not in the productive power of the American Nation; it is in our ability to distribute the purchasing power under a capitalistic economy.

I am certain, in my own mind, that under a capitalistic economy we can operate our productive instruments at full capacity, and I hope there is no Senator here who is so defeatist and so dismal in his outlook that he believes we must continue to operate in an era of scarcity so long as we maintain a free civilization.

Mr. President, in 1929 I went out into the Sacramento Valley, where I was practicing law, and I talked to the poultry producer; and I found that the poultry producers, with labor that was available, could easily produce twice as many hens and twice as many eggs as he was then producing. I went to the dairy people, and I found the same thing. I went to the fruit and truck people, and I went to our factories and railroads and stores; and everywhere in the Sacramento Valley, in 1929, I found a latent capacity to double our production of wealth, and I am prepared to show the definite figures to anyone who desires to challenge that statement. Then I carried on an investigation in the State of California; and I found that our great utilities, our factories, our great stores, our farmers everywhere, could produce far, far beyond what they ever had produced, lacking only the market and the buying power to stimulate ever-increasing production.

Mr. President, as we all know, the most conservative estimate by reputable economists shows that, in the United States, we could now produce upward of $110,000,000,000 of wealth, as compared with the sixty and seventy billion we have been producing. Consequently, I say that no one can legitimately make the argument that America is not wealthy enough to take care of its own retired citizens; of men who have been forced out of jobs by the infirmities of life, or by the oncoming power of technological development.

Mr. President, this brings me to one final point, and upon this I desire to conclude my argument. I might very honestly say that if it were not for the proprieties I would like to talk here a week upon this subject, but I am going to talk only a very few minutes longer. The complications of the Social Security Act cannot even be explained in the course of hours because its defects and contradictions are so many that the human tongue and the human brain cannot reckon with them in any brief period.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The able Senator said he would be delighted to speak a week. I am sure that I am one out of many Senators who would not be wearied if he did speak a week.

If the Senator will pardon me for a reference—it is hardly a question—I want to interject something in his speech. I fear, however, I will mar the symmetry and strength of the Senator's remarks.

A very able citizen, not residing in my State, wrote and said to me, "I understand you are going to support the Townsend bill as it is to be introduced by Senator DOWNEY. I would like to know what you mean by such a thing. Can you explain it?" The explanation I made to that citizen was to send him the bill, with the statement, "The bill itself is the strongest argument I can make." He was fair enough to reply, "Having read the bill, I am for it."

In this life we are beset by many perplexing things, and frequently we are in doubt as to which way to turn. One of the rules of moral philosophy is that, in the effort to discover what is right and what is wrong, we should search for simplicity. Truth is generally to be identified by its extreme simplicity. A complicated matter, crisscrossed by many lines, difficult of discernment and of analysis, may be suspected. The very simplicity of the Senator's new Townsend bill indicates its truth and its strength.

If I am correct in my analysis of the Senator's bill, it does not stop any issue, rent, profit, or income any man receives. A man may be eligible for this pension at 60 years of age, provided he does not receive or earn any salary or wages. Am I correct in that?

Mr. DOWNEY. That is correct.

Mr. ASHURST. Secondly, a boy 12 years of age could figure on the back of a postal card just how much each citizen owed and should pay the Government under the new Townsend plan. Am I correct about that?

Mr. DOWNEY. That is correct.

Mr. ASHURST. Note the simplicity. They send experts from the Bureau of Internal Revenue each year so that we may forsooth have help in making out our income-tax returns. Under existing law the wisest and the keenest and most competent man must have the aid of an expert in making out his return. That is what annoys and perplexes the citizen. The American citizen is glad to pay something to his Government, but he objects to the annoyance of being constantly beset by a number of perplexing questions he must answer, with the fear that he may be entrapped, notwithstanding he is trying to be fair.

I wish to commend to the Senate and to the country this new Townsend bill which the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] has proposed. Senators will be amazed at its simplicity. I repeat, a 12-year-old boy with his pencil could figure on the back of a postal card how much any citizen owed the Government under the Townsend income tax law.

Moreover, in this bill Dr. Townsend has hit upon a truth which may ultimately prove to be the solution of this country's financial troubles. We may come to it, and I think we should. The suggestion is, no appropriation without a tax side by side with it to pay for the appropriation.

Sometime, some place, somewhere, some wise man will drive through Congress a measure, or the American people will adopt a constitutional amendment, providing that there shall be no appropriation without a tax to accompany it. That will prove to be something which will aid the Government in meeting its bills in the future. It might prevent extreme inflation. Senators would find a pleasure in knowing that when they made an appropriation there would be a tax accompanying it to pay for it. Am I correct in saying the new bill so provides?

Mr. DOWNEY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ASHURST. I have studied the new Townsend bill, to be proposed by the Senator from California, for more than 2 months. I have given it the best thought of which I have been capable, and I hope the House will send it to us; I suppose the House will have to originate it. I happened to know the Senator from California when he was a very young boy, and I inflicted a torrent of words on an occasion when he was present more than 35 years ago, in a county courthouse in the West. I happen to know that he is a very able lawyer, and his career at the bar demonstrates that he has practiced law with much success. He spoke earlier in the day about two clients, one of whom was opulent—and I do not make any point against that; I have no envy of any opulent man or wealthy man—who had paid in only $90. Is that true?

Mr. DOWNEY. That is true.

Mr. ASHURST. Whereas his beneficiaries will receive $85 a month for many years. That does not arouse any envy in my breast. The Senator adverted, in the course of his able speech, to the fact that the beneficiaries of another citizen would receive a very small sum, though it is entirely possible that the citizen of small means may have paid into the social-security fund a larger sum than the citizen of opulent means had paid in. Could that happen?

Mr. DOWNEY. That might not only happen but will occur countless times.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. President, will it disrupt the Senator's argument if I ask him a question?

Mr. DOWNEY. Not at all, but before I yield I wish to thank the Senator from Arizona for his distinguished and happy contribution to the subject.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. I rise merely to add a confirmatory note to the very able and eloquent address which has been delivered by the Senator from California this afternoon, and to the further illuminating interjectory comment just contributed by the distinguished Senator from Arizona. I think the Senator from California would probably have little difficulty in obtaining an agreement among Senators that when money is in circulation in the United States we have what is called prosperity, that is, we have our economic plant running at somewhere near full capacity.

In the days of laissez faire capitalism, in the twenties, private capital kept itself in circulation largely by the device of private spending and private borrowing. Then, when the crash occurred, in 1930, and the present administration took charge of the economic and other affairs of the country, the same money was kept in circulation by Government borrowing and by Government spending, in place of the old private borrowing and private spending, which has more or less dried up, due to the accumulation of savings which the Senator very well points out in his excellent books. Since then we have been maintaining the plant of the United States running at part capacity largely by Government borrowing and Government spending, which it is perfectly obvious cannot go on much longer. It has probably averted catastrophe, because it has kept money in circulation, but it has done it at the expense of increased debt.

The plan the Senator proposes in his bill, which is known as the new Townsend plan, is the only plan I have seen presented which promises to keep money in circulation, which promises to maintain our economic and industrial plants running at somewhere near capacity, without the vicious counterpart of continually going into debt.

If anyone can suggest another method of doing what everyone realizes must be done, that is, keeping money in circulation, keeping the exchange of goods and services flowing freely, yet at the same time showing us how we can do it without going further into debt, other than by the very direct method of gross-income taxation, I think we would be more than glad to hear about that plan.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if the Senator from California will yield, the able Senator from Idaho made a statement which should not pass without more notice, although we always notice what he says. He says that if someone can devise a better plan than the bill the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] is urging, the new Townsend bill, let such a bill be brought forward. If someone can devise a better bill, let it be done, and we will give it consideration.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. President, the difficulty is that almost anything that is presented in order to keep this tottering economy of ours from completely collapsing involves deficit financing.

Mr. ASHURST. One further suggestion to the Senator. Let us assume a Senator whose salary is $10,000 a year; he and all other citizens should first be entitled to deduct $3,000 as their exemption. All citizens should be entitled to that exemption, $250 a month free from tax, or $3,000 a year. Assuming a Senator's salary is his only income, $10,000 minus $3,000 would leave $7,000, and his tax would be $140 a year.

There is not a Senator, not a Member of the House, in my judgment, if I understand my fellow Senators and Members of the House, who would not be delighted to make that contribution. The precedent set would be wholesome.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. President, I may add further, if the Senator will yield, to say that this conception of a gross-income tax is not new. The State of the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] has a gross-income tax now and has had for some time. I assume it is working out satisfactorily. Several of the European nations, notably Italy and France, have gross-income taxes, the proceeds of which are applied to particular purposes; and what purpose could be more worthy than the retirement of the old folks to whom this Nation owes so much. So there is nothing revolutionary in this matter. It is a perfectly fine, tested theory of taxation. The only revolutionary thing is that for once we would have the proceeds of the tax earmarked and put right back in circulation and paid to those who deserve it most.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, when the able Senator from California yielded to me I was fishing around in the dark recesses of my mind to find a world appropriate to express what I wished to say. I could not think of the word "earmarked." That is the word I meant to use.

If the Senator will pardon me further, I hope the time will come when every appropriation must be earmarked by a tax to accompany it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I might add that the State of Minnesota for more than 40 years has taxed its railroads on the basis of gross earnings, and many of our State taxes are earmarked for certain purposes.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I am profoundly grateful for the contributions that have been made to this discussion by the Senators from Arizona, Idaho, and Minnesota. I hope at some future date to present a discussion of the problem of excess savings as the cause of the break-down of our economy, and I hope and trust that the Senator from Idaho at that time will enlarge upon the theory which he has adverted to here.

I cannot conclude my remarks, Mr. President, without discussing somewhat the experience I had with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] to which he adverted a while ago, and I must say that it is partly the example of the distinguished Senator from Arizona that makes me want to talk another week upon this subject, though I feel compelled to restrict myself to an additional 15 minutes.

Like the Senator, I come from the great and boundless West. In my younger days I spent some time around a lonely mining camp near Winnemucca, which is out on the desert of Nevada, where the great boast of the prospectors and the people generally is that one of the great statesmen and speakers and philosophers of America was born there, to wit, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. I have never told the Senator that before, but many times when I have been out in the lonely mining camps in the deserts of Nevada I have found the people there still talking of Senator ASHURST. Senator ASHURST was taken to Arizona when a mere child, and his high ability there immediately manifested itself.

At one time, when I was about 17 or 18 years of age, when I had been expelled from a preparatory school, my father sent me out to labor in the world with a surveying crew and one day I came into the town of Flagstaff, Ariz. And as I approached the courthouse I saw a great crowd surrounding the building and there was a great air of excitement. As I walked up to the steps to see what the occurrence was I heard a booming, vibrant voice coming out from the courtroom. I asked one of the bystanders what was up and he told me there was a famous murder case at trial, and that a young district attorney, who was known as the silver-tongued orator of Coconino County, was making an address for the prosecution. Even then I was interested in oratory, so I decided to listen and finally wormed my way up into a crowded window and I looked out into the courtroom, where I could see the judge upon the bench, the unfortunate defendant, and the jury, and there addressing the jury was a great, broad-shouldered, fine-looking young man, I guess of 26 or 27, holding forth with powerful magnetic oratory. The first thing I heard him say, Mr. President, was this:

> Now gentlemen of the jury, as I stated to you when I began this argument 1 week ago [laughter], I had 10 points to develop. I have now covered the first 2, and I am going to proceed to the third one. [Laughter.]

I might say, Mr. President, that right there my surveying crew lost an employee, because I stayed to listen to all the points, and I lost nearly a month's salary.

Mr. MINTON. What happened to the defendant?

Mr. DOWNEY. The defendant was convicted. For Senator ASHURST had even then the great power of oratory which has made him so noted here.

When I was an amateur in the Senate several months ago, in my first session, there had been long and laborious arguments, and some of the columnists had been complaining because the Senators were taking up so much time, either stating what was obviously so, or worse what was obviously not so, and I think our most distinguished orator, the Senator from Arizona, who combines a perfect facility of language with a great philosophy and a great poetical imagination, rose and said there and then that he believed that any Senator, without exception, should be able to say all that he had in his mind in the brief space of 15 minutes. That took me back to those Flagstaff days when I had heard him talking as a young lawyer.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I would be lacking in grace and would be either less than human or more than human if I did not seek this opportunity to thank the genial and able Senator from California, whom, as I said, I have known since his boyhood, and whom I am particularly proud to call my friend, and with his kind permission, I know he will not be offended if I circulate some portions of his speech in my State in the forthcoming campaign. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, our ever-distinguished colleague has the happy closing word, and I cannot close upon any happier note than he has done, so I will now again advert to the last point, which will not occupy more than a few moments.

Mr. President, one of the contentions made against the Townsend plan, and indeed any general pension law, is that it is not ethically or morally just to grant pensions to people past 60 or 65 years of age as a matter of social right, but that those pensions should be based upon what is termed need, and some of the most distinguished members of our executive branch have so expressed themselves; that we can only maintain thrift and energy and a better character by compelling the people to save, upon penalty that if they do not save they shall be consigned to the poorhouse, to insecurity, and lack of dignity and protection in their old age.

First let me say this also, Mr. President. It ill behooves any member of the executive department, or any Senator or any Representative who has voted for the social-security plan—the contributory part I am talking about now—to invoke that sort of an argument against the Townsend plan, because by figures that I employed here before, which the Social Security Board cannot deny, the present contributory plan is a fake scheme of contributions, and is in reality a thinly disguised social-dividend plan.

The only difference between the social-dividend plan of the Social Security Act, and the one embodied in the Townsend bill is that under the latter our social dividends would be paid equally from public moneys to all citizens of the United States past 60 who had retired from gainful employment, but under the present unhappy social-security plan, with its social dividends, annuities are now being distributed, but in the inverse order of the need of the recipients. Consequently, I cannot understand how any person who defends or who has voted for the Social Security Act with its socially paid pensions can raise that argument.

It is true, Mr. President, that there is a tax levied upon the wages of the contributors, and that argument is used to defend the idea that the contributory plan is one of thrift and respectability, while the Townsend plan would be one of charity and degradation.

Let me point out to Senators that a tax upon the pay rolls of the workers is an involuntary act, so far as the worker is concerned. He does not voluntarily pay that tax. The Federal Government says, "We will take a certain amount out of your wages." I appeal to Senators, is there any difference in principle in involuntarily taxing a man's wages, or taxing involuntarily his consumption? We are all consumers. We all will pay into this social-security fund. It is true that the unfortunates will receive a larger amount than the more fortunate people of the country, but many of our governmental functions are distributed on the same basis. The poor man may send many children to a public school; the rich man may not have so many children, or may send them to a private school; but does the law make any difference in that respect or in police protection, or in the protection afforded by our courts which guarantee equal service to all.

No. The Townsend plan is a wise system of national group insurance in which all classes pay according to their consumption and every man receives an equal amount, that amount depending upon the number receiving benefits and the amount raised. But in no case can it fairly be contended that the recipient who has involuntarily paid a consumption tax is in any different position than the recipient who has been compelled by national law to pay a pay-roll tax.

Mr. President, I do not desire to rest my argument upon that principle, logical and honest as it is. I appeal now to a higher principle. I take it that we still remain a Christian Nation. Suppose, then, one were traveling in some distant country among primitive tribes, and he should go into some village and see an abundance of food, shelter, and clothing for all, and then in some corral, separated from the rest of the populace, he should see elderly, suffering people, lacking food, warmth, and housing. He would say, "Who are these unfortunates whom you condemn to poverty and insecurity?" He would be told that those miserable outcasts were the elderly people who could no longer hunt, plant, and reap with the rest of the tribe, and consequently they were consigned to degredation and humiliation.

What would we think of such a primitive tribe, Mr. President? But we should not find that condition among the uncivilized. The wild tribes, lacking our Christianity and civilization, grant to the elders of the race, who have performed their work, the same food, shelter, clothing, and dignity that they give to the younger workers; but we, a Christian civilization of imperial wealth, have evolved a plan under which we use a worker's brawn and muscle until machines displace him, until we do not want him any longer, when we boot him out into idleness and then degrade him by giving him a quarter of what he has been receiving as wages.

Mr. President, a social-dividend plan can be urged upon another noble ground. It can be put on the basis of simple justice. For our older who are now in desperate need, whose savings have been wiped out by a gigantic depression for which they were not responsible, are the very ones who have built the productive instruments from which our food, shelter, and clothing now come.

Mr. President, I have often said to my children that they will never know what real work is. I refer to the work done by the last generation. The men and women who are now 60, 70, and 80 years of age were largely active in the latter pioneering stage of our Nation. They worked 10, 12, 14—yes, 18—hours a day; and if there are Senators who were boys on farms in New England, the Middle West, or the West, they will know that I speak the truth. Those are the men and women who built this great industrial empire under which the rest of us now live—warm, secure, and comfortable. Of those who were 50 years of age and upward in 1929, 9 out of 10 in the intervening time have lost their savings, their insurance, and their property. We know they were loyal, decent American citizens. We know that they helped to build the wealth which now provides for the rest of us.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. During the depression the people to whom the Senator refers lost their life savings because they had invested them in the orthodox instruments which had been provided by the printing machines, in the form of stocks, bonds, and so forth. They lost them in closed banks, because the banks were filled with orthodox papers that could not be liquidated. There was no security. Our national economy was ruined. I am wondering whether or not the Senator has explored the question of the extent to which such a plan as he suggests might effect a stabilization of our national economy through purchasing security. The money would go back into circulation, and those who are worried about poverty and old age would not have to take the risk of investing their savings in securities which have no security at all, in spite of the fact that we have a so-called Securities and Exchange Commission to guard the savings of investors. In this manner we might find a method of stabilizing our national economy so as to prevent calamitous collapses in our national economy due to the fact that our machinery for investment has been based upon a wrong theory. It has been based on the theory that no matter how many bonds or stocks are printed—and paper is cheap, and printing presses have immense capacity—all we need to do in order to have something for old age is to buy a piece of paper with a gold star and a pretty green border. However, we experienced a great disillusionment. The money is gone, and there is now no security for old age. It seems to me that the proposed tax would in fact be a purchase of old-age security by whomever contributed to it; and it might remove the speculative urge which has impelled our people to invest in fly-by-night enterprises for the purpose of having something for old age, only to find, when old age comes, that they have been investing in a pipe dream.

Has the Senator explored that question from the standpoint of economics?

Mr. DOWNEY. Yes. Mr. President, I have, and I am deeply grateful for the contribution made by the Senator from Minnesota. I wholeheartedly agree with him that the transfer of a great volume of purchasing power from the well-to-do groups to the relatively poor people past 60, and the regulation of its spending and velocity, would be a great instrument for stabilizing our economy.

I wish to refer to another thing which the Senator has suggested. Investigation seems to show that 9 out of 10 persons who were past 50 years of age in 1929 have lost all the savings they had at that time. I can assure Senators from personal knowledge that in the Sacramento Valley at least 90 percent of my clients, who had been loyal Americans and the best citizens of that community, lost everything they had, and have been living precarious, insecure years ever since. As the Senator has suggested, that result was not due to anything for which they were personally responsible. They were the victims of this great industrial civilization, which struck down employment, securities, and values in 1929 with a titanic, impersonal sweep.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And closed the banks.

Mr. DOWNEY. And, as the Senator has said, closed the banks. The ways in which people lost money in 1929 were so myriad and weird that they can hardly be stated. I see one banker present in the Chamber. Let me tell him the strange way in which a client of mine lost everything she had in 1929.

She had been a school teacher perhaps for 30 years, and had laboriously accumulated $20,000. She used to come into my office on small business. She told me that she had $20,000 in Government bonds in a safe-deposit box, that she would never sign her name to an obligation or contract, and that she expected to be safe and secure with that $20,000.

About 1926 or 1927 she came into my office with beaming face and told me that an unknown uncle of hers had died in Detroit, Mich., leaving her $20,000 worth of bank stock. She put the bank stock in her safe-deposit box. Sometime in 1930 or thereabouts the bank whose stock she owned went broke, and Uncle Sam reached his powerful hand into her safe-deposit box, under her stockholders' liability, and took her $20,000 in Government bonds away from her.

That, of course, is an extreme case; but four out of five of our people who have lost their life savings in the past 10 or 12 years were absolutely innocent of any responsibility for such loss.

The question is, what shall we do about it? Shall we leave them in degradation and misery, with an average payment of $4 a week? If any Senators are skeptical that the present pension payments are so small, let me say that I wrote twice to Mr. McNutt, telling in a general way what my data would be, and asking him to have experts here to correct me. Evidently the Social Security Board has been compelled to accept as correct the figure of $4 a week as the average payment to our elderly people, incredible as that may seem, in view of the delusive and optimistic propaganda of the Social Security Board.

Mr. President, it is the philosophy of the Townsend movement that people past 60 who want to retire shall be regarded as elder partners who have done their life's work and are entitled from our national economy to a dividend payment from the Nation's wealth equal to the basic average payment per capita in the United States.

Let me say that I perceive one unhappy feature of the present Townsend bill. Eighty-seven percent of the men 65 years of age who are married have wives under 65. Taking the married men past 60, about 40 percent of the wives are under 60 years of age. Manifestly, it costs just as much for a man of 60 or 65 to support a wife whether she is 57 or 60 or 61 or 62. Under the present social-security law men are given $10 or $15 or $20 a month without any additional allowance for the wife when she is under 65, and are compelled to support themselves and their wives upon that amount. I believe that if and when this bill goes before the committee, some consideration should be given to that great group of citizens who are married, who are past 60, but whose wives have not yet attained that age, because the burden upon them of supporting their aged wives is just as great whether the wives be 58 or 62.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ELLENDER in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. May I ask the Senator what is the status of his bill at the present time? What is being done about it?

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I am afraid that nothing is being done about it. It has been referred to the Finance Committee. I had intended to present a resolution asking the Finance Committee to proceed forthwith to an investigation, but I was informed today that one objection could block any consideration of such a resolution, and I knew that the objection would be made; so that the only way is to present such a resolution and have it referred to the Committee on Finance, which I shall do at some later date.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the able Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DOWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I certainly hope that the bill will be given an early hearing by the Senate of the United States, in order that we may have a full and complete discussion of this important subject.

Millions of Americans demand a hearing and full discussion before the Senate. Our 12,000,000 of unemployed demand recovery legislation and our senior citizens have a right to be heard here in the Nation's greatest forum.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I personally am desperately anxious that the combined ability and experience of the Senators upon the Finance Committee shall again take up the problem of old-age pensions. I believe that one reason the present social-security law is so involved and so complicated is that it came from the efforts of a personnel who had not had experience in business, judicial, or public life, and I have no doubt that the combined wisdom of a Senate committee would produce a bill of much greater worth and value to the American people than is represented by the Social Security Act.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. It so happens that I am a member of the Senate Finance Committee, and, in view of what the Senator has said, I am happy to give him my assurance that, insofar as my vote counts on that committee, I shall be very much pleased to have this bill given extended hearings and study and consideration at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I am grateful and encouraged by the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts. I think that when the Senators learn how the present Social Security Act is not working out they will see the necessity of turning to some other law; I hope and believe that they will think that in the present Townsend bill is at least the best chance for a fair, workable pension law; and if a report could be ready at the incoming of the next Congress, I think it would be an extremely desirable development in our legislative program.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, if the Senator from California will permit me, the committee, of course, would obey the desire of the Senate if expressed in a resolution adopted by a majority vote, and I have no doubt that a majority of the Senate would so vote.

Mr. DOWNEY. I feel it incumbent upon me to say that I telephoned the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] this morning that I wanted to present such a resolution and hoped it would have his acquiescence, and that he would not object to its consideration; but the Senator from Mississippi told me that it was a very serious matter, and he would not want to give his consent without listening to the argument and thinking it over. While I should like very much to present such a resolution now, the Senator from Mississippi is not present, and I suppose it would hardly be proper for me to do so.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I inquire what is the nature of the resolution the Senator proposes to offer?

Mr. DOWNEY. I propose to offer a resolution requesting the Finance Committee, at its earliest convenience, to proceed to a reexamination of the terms and workings out of the present old-age insurance and old-age assistance features of the Social Security Act, and likewise of the new Townsend bill.

Mr. McNARY. Such a motion would not necessarily have to go to the Finance Committee. Probably that would only bring about delay. I suggest that the resolution be allowed to lie on the table, and then it could be brought up at any time and a vote had.

Mr. MINTON. As I understood the Senator, the resolution would remain at the desk and on some future day he could call it up.

Mr. DOWNEY. I would rather call it up now after I shall have finished speaking.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I understand from the able Senator from California that the resolution has not been filed.

Mr. DOWNEY. No; it has not.

Mr. McNARY. The only reason I made the suggestion was that the Senator stated he would file such a resolution and have it referred to the Finance Committee. I thought that would bring about delay, whereas if the resolution were submitted and allowed to lie on the table it could be brought up at any time as a resolution coming over from a previous day.

Mr. DOWNEY. Would that involve any great delay?

Mr. McNARY. No; merely file it and have it lie on the table, and then it will come up as a resolution coming over from a previous day and it can be discussed and voted on.

Mr. DOWNEY. I am deeply appreciative of the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon, and I will take that course, then, and file the resolution later this afternoon.

Mr. President, just a few words more and I shall have concluded. It is my solemn conviction that there is no single legislative act this Congress could perform that would bring the happiness and tranquillity to a great body of American citizenry as would the passage of the Townsend bill.

I have no doubt when the actual bill is under analysis that modifications and some improvements may be made in the measure which we have presented, and, of course, we would welcome any improvements the Senate might make in the bill.

Mr. President, it seems to me that out of this chaotic era should at least come two new fundamental human rights. Which of those rights is the more important to our civilization and our people I would not attempt to say; but I would say, Mr. President, that if out of the insecurity and anguish and chaos of this era came two new American rights we might perhaps solace ourselves for all the misfortunes and ills that have afflicted our people in the past decade. The two rights to which I refer, Senators, are the right of the worker to opportunity of employment at a just wage and the right of the senior citizens of America to serenity, security, and dignity by social dividends paid them as a matter of right and not as a matter of charity.

BURDEN ON EARNER HELD LOWER NOW—STATISTICAL ASSOCIATION HEAD SAYS REPRODUCTIVE-AGE GROUP HAS FEWER DEPENDENTS—DROP OF 20 PERCENT IN CENTURY—PEARL SAYS GERMANS HAVE REVERSED POPULATION ADVANTAGE OF ALLIES SINCE WORLD WAR

(By Laurence E. Davies)

PHILADELPHIA, December 29.—In the face of the increasingly vocal demands of the "old folks" for adequate care, and the gains of child-labor legislation putting off the time when the juvenile population may start fending for itself, Prof. Raymond Pearl, of Johns Hopkins University, said here tonight that "the total burden" upon the "reproducer-worker" age group in America had lessened by about 20 percent during the last century.

Dr. Pearl assembled his figures, which he admitted might "prove a little surprising," in his address as retiring president of the American Statistical Association, celebrating its centenary at the present Philadelphia meeting held in conjunction with sessions of a dozen allied societies in the social-science field.

Dr. Pearl, both a biologist and statistician, accepted for his purposes the classification of the life cycle in three phases, the prereproductive stage including persons up to 14 years inclusive, the reproductive stage, 15 to 49 years, inclusive, and the post-reproductive stage, 50 years and over.

CITES RECORDS OF 30 STATES

His figures showed, he said, that in "the always harassed" second group, every 1,000 of them in 1840 "had 1,084 other persons, younger and older, besides themselves, to take care of, and in the main earn the livings for."

A century later, he declared, every 1,000 of the some 44,000,000 workers in this phase of life had only 880 persons besides themselves to take care of, "out of the total of 38,800,000 persons in the prereproductive and post-reproductive phases of life combined." His comparison was based on 30 States, for which figures were available in the two periods. The element of unemployment did not figure in the tabulation.

OF STARS, MEN, AND ATOMS—NOTEBOOK OF SCIENCE PROGRESS IN FIELD, LABORATORY, AND STUDY

(By Thomas R. Henry)

A permanent fighting manpower of approximately 26,380,000 for the United States—nearly 3,000,000 more than were available during the World War—was predicted today by Dr. Guy I. Burch, director of the Population Reference Bureau here, which includes on its council some of the foremost American experts on population trends.

With a declining birth rate and the average age of American citizens increasing due to the decline in child mortality, fears have been expressed that eventually this country may fall an easy prey to a "young nation" which encourages and maintains a high birth rate, such as Japan or Germany.

If present trends continue, it is predicted, in 1980 those born in the United States each year will about balance those who die and the population will become stationary.

"But," reports Dr. Burch, "if 20 to 45 is considered the military age, the United States will have more males of fighting age in 1980 than she had in 1930 and considerably more than she had during the World War. In 1930 there were some 23,600,000 males between these ages. In 1980 there will be 26,380,000, not including additions through immigration. The average age of the manpower will be somewhat greater, but there is no evidence to prove that this will lower the efficiency of the Army. It may even improve it.

"While 18 or 20 to 45 may be considered the military age, war affects the whole national economy, and males between the ages of 45 and 65 are needed to take the places of those withdrawn for military service. With this in mind, it is significant that there will be nearly 9,000,000 more males between the ages of 45 and 65 in 1980 than there were in 1930. Therefore, even if machines of war and industry do not have a tendency to replace the common soldier and unskilled laborer, the United States will have abundant manpower in time of war."

There is little likelihood of Americans becoming a race of dependent old people when the stabilized population is reached, Mr. Burch's calculations show.

"While the productive age group will increase for a time and then remain more or less stationary," he says, "there will be a considerable change in the age groups under 20 and over 65 years of age. Speaking in percentages, by 1980 those under 20 may decrease from about 35 percent to about 27 percent of the total population, while those over 65 may increase from 7 to 15 percent. If we receive a large number of immigrants in the near future and do not have a war, pestilence, or some other disaster that carries away a considerable number now in the productive age group, it is possible that the old-age group of the population may reach 18 percent about 2000 A. D.

"These shifts should create a number of minor problems of adjustment, but none that should weaken the national economy. The productive capacity of the Nation, so far as age is concerned, should be as great per capita as it was in our peak prosperity year of 1929, and the support of dependent old people should not cost the Nation any more, or as much, as it would cost to support and educate an equal number of dependent youngsters.

"The dependent old people over 65 can hardly hope to cast more than one-fourth of the total vote of the Nation, even if no restrictions are put upon their voting by the vast majority in the productive age, or if the voting age is not lowered to 18 years. If persons over the age of 35 or 40 are more conservative than those below that age, the Nation will become more conservative. Whether this will be good or bad for the country depends on the relative values of experience and enthusiasm. But regardless of the medical sciences, nature still eliminates old people much faster than young. Practically all the saving of life has been in the age groups under 65 years."

For a time, he says, there will be a small increase among those in the "prime of life" group between 20 and 30. In 1860, when the population of the country was undergoing one of its most rapid increases, he points out, only about 38 percent of the whole were in this group and more than half were under 20. In 1930 nearly 44 percent were in the 20 to 50 age group and by 1950 this will amount to about 46 percent. After 1950 the proportion in this age group will decrease to about 40 percent, where it will remain practically stationary. The indications are that the "prime of life" group, he says, will remain practically stationary for about 200 years. Thus no great upset in the proportion of employables need be expected.

An increase of about 25,000,000 in the total population of the Nation is to be expected before the end of the century, he says—assuming that immigration remains unchanged and there is no monumental disaster.

Mr. DOWNEY subsequently submitted a resolution (S. Res. 254), which was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance of the Senate, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is requested to investigate and report to the Senate, at its earliest convenience, with respect to (1) the provisions of the Social Security Act, as amended, relating to old-age assistance and Federal old-age and survivors' insurance benefits, with a view to determining the effect of such provisions and the manner in which they are being administered; and (2) the provisions of the bill (S. 3255) known as the General Welfare Act, with a view to determining the effect of the provisions of such bill.

THE AMERICAN FLAG AND AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the distinguished junior Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY]. I am particularly happy to compliment him upon the exposé of the Social Security Act and its ineffectiveness. I am also happy to know where he got his ability. I knew the distinguished Senator 35 years ago in the University of Michigan. I have found out now, after 35 years, where he got his start. It was looking through a courthouse window in Arizona, and listening to the silver-tongued orator whom we have all learned to love as Senator ASHURST.

Mr. President, last Saturday it was my privilege, with many other Senators, to witness a great parade. It was Army Day. I stood in the shadow of the Capitol of the United States and saw 25,000 persons march by. I can never look at a parade such as this, with American flags waving in the breeze, with men in uniform, without feeling a thrill. It takes me back through the years to many similar experiences. When I was a mere boy I saw the veterans of the Civil War march by in closed ranks. Most of them have gone into the Great Beyond. It takes me back also to the days of the War with Spain; and, of course, it brings up the stirring martial days of our war with Germany, and parades of veterans since those days.

But, Mr. President, what I really rose to say was that while this magnificent array of men and equipment, women and high-school lads in uniform marched by me, and I thrilled to the martial music and to the measured steps of the marchers, there was one discordant note in the whole picture. It was this: I have said that the flag of the Nation went by. There were groups of flags and then single flags. Every time a flag went by, I saluted; but I noticed that some men who stood by me did not salute. There were two young men, who looked to me to be about 20 or 21 years of age, standing near me. I said to them, "Were you never taught to salute the flag of your country as it went by?" They said, "No." I said, "Well, it is never too late to begin"; but there was no response to my suggestion. They simply stood and with stony faces, apparently unaffected by the sight, continued to watch the various groups go by.

After this experience I looked up and down the crowd on both sides of the thoroughfare as far as I could see. I was pleased to notice that as the flag went by, men here and there doffed their hats—that is, some did—and some saluted; but a number, it appeared to me, did not do so. I was happy to notice that every Washington policeman I saw saluted and stood at attention as the flag went by. I was happy to notice that every man in uniform who was not in the parade, but was on the side lines, stood at attention and saluted. I was happy to see two Congressmen salute, and I saw school children stand at attention and salute; and one particular little incident came to my attention when I saw a little lad 3 years old, who was standing with his father, salute as the flag went by.

I know that it is not a major offense to fail to salute the flag of one's country. Perhaps, in many instances, it was a clear case of unintentional neglect. Perhaps, in other instances, it was due to ignorance of what was proper. But, Mr. President, saluting the flag is but a symbol of a frame of mind. By the very act of saluting one pledges himself to maintain inviolate the American freedoms, the great values which were handed down to all of us by those who have gone before, which we have done nothing to bring into existence, but which, if we are true Americans, we will do whatever is necessary to preserve intact so that we can hand them down unimpaired to the generations that are to come after us.

Mr. President, I do not want America to become a great military nation; I do not want America to be dominated by a military class; but I do want my children so to love this country that they will be ready to ward off all enemies, foreign and domestic.

Mr. President, when I saluted the flag last Saturday, as did others, I also saluted the man who carried it and the men who were undergoing training and becoming the first line of defense if the occasion should ever arise to protect my America. I saluted also the veterans of former days, the living and the dead who gave, as Lincoln said, "their last full measure of devotion" to preserve this Nation. I noticed that the Legionnaires in the parade were not so young as they used to be. Their sons and daughters were marching in uniform with them.

Mr. President, I shall continue as I was taught to do away back in my school days, always to stand at attention and salute when the flag goes by. I still get a thrill out of the act. It is my hope that when I see the next parade—perhaps on Memorial Day—I shall see more people stand at attention and give the salute; for, to me, the salute is a symbol of something else, and that is that the man or woman who gives it is conscious of being an American, conscious that citizenship in this Nation invokes duties and obligations as well as freedoms and privileges.

In practically all of the schools throughout the land the following pledge is taught:

I pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States of America,
And to the Republic for which it stands,
One Nation indivisible.
With liberty and justice for all.

I love to see children, Boy Scouts, and grown-ups, when the occasion calls for it, stand at attention and take this pledge.

You will notice, Mr. President, that the pledge reads: "I pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States of America"—not a foreign flag, not foreign "isms" or ideologies, but the flag of the United States, which is a symbol of all that is best in America.

In the pledge there is also contained the statement, "I pledge allegiance to the Republic for which this flag stands." That is it. It is the Republic. It is not a Fascist or a Communist or a Socialistic state. It is not a democracy. It is a republic, with its checks and balances. It is a republic, with an executive limited in function, a judiciary limited in function, and a legislature limited in function; a republic, where the residue of power is lodged in the people. It is "One Nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

Mr. President, I remember that a child of mine, when a youngster, came home one day, with her eyes shining, and said to her mother: "I know what the flag is. It's not just made up of colors—red, white, and blue; but, Mother, our teacher says you're in that flag, and dad's in that flag, and I'm in that flag." That teacher had "gotten across" to the child something very important, something that it would be well for all who claim to be Americans fully to understand. The American Legion today is doing a great work in making our citizens America-conscious.

Mr. President, may I be privileged to relate another incident which comes to my mind? I speak of this matter now because the distinguished junior Senator from the great State of Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER] will shortly call up a bill for the establishment of Citizenship Day. The bill recently passed our committee unanimously, and we think the establishment of such a day would be a wonderful thing. So I want to relate this incident—and I shall not be long—which has stuck in my memory through the years.

About 30 years ago, at Fond du Lac, Wis., the G. A. R. was holding its encampment. It was my privilege to attend the meeting, and I remember that there was present a veteran of the "boys in gray." I can recall nothing about the convention except the incident in which this American took part. He had been a colonel or a major in the Confederate Army, and he was called to the stage to address the veterans in blue. As he came up to the stage, he tripped over a part of a large American flag standing at the corner. Then occurred the incident. He reached up and caught the standard and the flag. With gray locks down upon his shoulders and deep-set eyes in a chiseled face, his eyes lighted with the light of a great faith and he cried out to the audience, who seemed to become electrified, because there was a man who was speaking something elemental. Taking the flag in his arms, he said, "Old glory, thank God, you are my flag again. You were the flag of my forefathers who fought in the Revolution, who fought in Mexico, and I fought against you, but you're my flag again." As he said this, with tears streaming down his cheeks, he cried with a voice carrying conviction and appeal such as I have seldom heard, "You're my flag again, and I pledge to you all that I have. I pledge to you my sons and daughters of generations yet unborn for the preservation of a united nation, and her ideals of freedom, equality, and justice!"

I said something electric went through that audience, of which I was a part. Some superficial thinkers would call it mere dramatics, but no one there called it that. It was the voice of a reunited America. It was the voice of a patriot, one who knew the need of standing by the flag.

In these times, when many of our people are thinking about Europe, I myself find guidance and direction in the fervent voice of this great Confederate who long ago, undoubtedly, has gone to his reward. It was this country that was uppermost in his mind; and today the address of the distinguished junior Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] indicated that it was his country and the aged of this country that were uppermost in his mind.

Some of us are called isolationists because we know there are many who, we believe mistakenly, are thinking in terms of involving this country in European quarrels; and I heard such a speech just the other night.

Some of us are called isolationists because we take the position that as public officials we feel that America's business is to stay in the Western Hemisphere, solve her domestic problems, do that which is necessary to provide jobs for the unemployed, and do what was suggested here today, make some provision for the aged, those who need help, to create so far as possible a self-sufficiency, so that we can, indeed, when the fighting is over in Europe, reach out a helping hand to help them over there. We feel that to become involved in the European controversy would not only dissipate our usefulness to help those "poor devils" when they need help, but by that very act of intervention or participation we would be throwing away the great American freedoms which we as trustees have no right to dissipate or be profligate with.

Mr. President, there is on the Senate calendar House Joint Resolution 437, providing for a citizenship day, the idea being that there is a need to set aside a day dedicated to the new citizens of this country—our sons and daughters who have become of age, and the naturalized citizens who have joined our ranks. My own State, Wisconsin, was a pioneer in this work. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD an article prepared by Hugh S. Bonar, superintendent of schools of Manitowoc, Wis., entitled "New voter preparation and recognition."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE STREAM OF NEW LIFE

Some two and a half million young men and women in the United States each year reach the age of 21 and come into their heritage of sovereign citizenship to exercise authority that was once the privilege only of kings. Along with thousands of naturalized citizens they become new voters. To them we must look to safeguard the foundation principle of our democracy—universal suffrage with the secret ballot. Should they not be prepared with great care for this high office and recognized with impressive ceremonies which they will remember all their lives? How can America make the most of the possibilities of this great body of new voters? Citizenship Day as it began in Manitowoc County, Wis., in 1939, has become the starting point for a Nation-wide movement which makes a strong appeal to everyone interested in the future of America.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the distinguished junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] has just brought to the attention of the Senate a joint resolution which has already been ordered reported from the Committee on the Judiciary and which seeks to have a day set aside and observed as new voters day in America, and a day upon which naturalized citizens shall become citizens of the United States. Inasmuch as we have so many days to observe in the United States, so many of which are passed over almost unobserved, the committee suggested the 14th day of June, because that is Flag Day.

Inasmuch as the junior Senator from Wisconsin has so appropriately brought to the attention of the Senate the obligation we owe to this special class of citizens, I wish to tell the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, a story which no doubt he will recall.

I first came as a visitor to the Senate of the United States in 1928. At that time one of the Senators from Alabama was Mr. Heflin, and a debate was proceeding on the floor of the Senate with respect to the courtesy to which the flag was entitled from the people of America. I recall something he said which appealed to me, and I will have to quote it from memory, although it has been 12 years since I heard that beautiful speech on the floor of the Senate. Among other remarks Senator Heflin made upon that occasion he recited this beautiful piece of poetry:

Here's to the blue of the wind-swept North
When we meet on the fields of France,
May the spirit of Grant be with you all,
As the sons of the North advance.

Here's to the gray of the sun-kissed South
When we meet on the fields of France,
May the spirit of Lee be with you all,
As the sons of the South advance.

And here's to the blue and gray as one
When we meet on the fields of France,
May the spirit of God be with you all,
As the sons of the flag advance.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, before the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER] yields the floor I wish to congratulate him upon his memory of the event to which he has referred. It is remarkable to have a memory which registers so truly as does the memory of the able junior Senator from Kentucky.

I suppose, of course, that the chairman of every committee thinks his particular committee is important, and while I realize that there are other important committees in the Senate, I somehow feel a deep affection for the various members of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, of which committee I am the chairman. They can bear testimony as to the diligence with which we labor, having so many refined distinctions to consider in connection with two or three hundred different bills. I seize this opportunity to thank the junior Senator from Kentucky and the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] for the diligence and the zeal with which they applied themselves to House Joint Resolution 437, authorizing the President of the United States of America to proclaim citizenship day for the recognition, observance, and commemoration of American citizenship.

The subcommittee held hearings and took the testimony of a number of patriotic citizens. It then reported to the main committee, and the main committee have reported the joint resolution with some amendments. I hope the able Senator from Kentucky at the earliest opportunity will seek recognition for the consideration and passage of the House joint resolution through the Senate. It is a most worthy measure. It will result in no expense to the Government. It lays an emphasis, a just and a timely emphasis, upon the fact that American citizenship is a high privilege, that no greater opportunity and no greater honor can come to a person in this world today than to be an American citizen.

I am particularly indebted to the able senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] for the zeal and the ability with which he applied himself to this joint resolution, and for the help he gave to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary in its consideration of this important resolution.

Some may say this joint resolution is merely a gesture. Very well, Mr. President. Although I cannot speak French, I will say that it is a beau geste, it is a beautiful gesture, a timely one, and I hope the Senator will secure recognition to have his joint resolution passed at an early date.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I may say to the distinguished Senator, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, that we will seek recognition and an opportunity at the earliest possible moment to advance this very important piece of legislation. I am sincerely hopeful that the distinguished senior Senator from California will offer a suggested amendment which has been provided. There is a poem entitled "I am an American," and I think it would be an exceedingly fine thing for the people of America if all the young men and young women who attain voting age, and approximately 180,000 who voluntarily become citizens of the United States of America, would join on the 14th day of June each year, in a broadcast, which could be heard around the world, and would say, "I am an American, and from this time henceforth, God being my helper, I will protect and defend the Constitution of the United States."

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I am glad to tell the Senator from Kentucky that in the city of New York last summer such a meeting was held in Central Park, and over 25,000 boys and girls of New York City who had become 21 years of age that year met in the park that afternoon in a patriotic celebration, and ended the celebration with the statement, "I am an American." So it is not a gesture. It is already on the way.

AIR BASE AT ANCHORAGE, ALASKA

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, within the next few weeks there will be presented to the Senate a question which I consider of extreme importance. An issue raised in an editorial in this morning's Washington Post involves the question of an appropriation for the construction of an air base at Anchorage, Alaska, which was, I think through misapprehension, eliminated from the appropriation bill at the other end of the Capitol.

In these days we hear many people saying that the United States is protected by two oceans, one on the east side 3,000 miles in width, the other on the west 5,000 miles in width. It seems to me important that there be a realization that a portion of the territory of the United States comes in almost direct contact with one of the other nations of the world. I refer to the Territory of Alaska.

I wish to read from this editorial, which I will insert in its entirety at the conclusion of my remarks. I read:

During recent months reports have reached Washington of intensified Russian military activity in northeastern Asia. At least three fortified areas are under construction at Kamchatka. Gun and plane installations are reported to have been completed on Sakhalin Island and the north-central shore of the Sea of Okhotsk. A naval air station has been created on the Komandorski Islands, which are only 260 miles northwest of Attu Island in the Aleutians.

To be sure, Russian activity in this area can be explained wholly in terms of its rivalry with Japan and the possibility at some time or other of a Russo-Japanese conflict. But, whatever its present purpose, the fortification of regions in Siberia not far removed from Alaska cannot be safely ignored by the United States. Nor can we close our eyes to the fact that, with Alaska relatively unprotected, an enemy might outflank the great defensive system at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, by an attack on Alaska.

The War Department has asked for an appropriation of $12,700,000 for the creation of an air base at Anchorage.

I wish it were possible for every Member of the Senate fully to appreciate the way the Aleutian Islands extend over into the Pacific Ocean to a point where they are almost within sight of the Russian Islands, which, as described in the morning Washington Post, are being fortified.

I wish we could also appreciate the fact that Japan is a distance of only 2 hours away by airplane at the present rate of traveling by large bombing planes from the Aleutian Islands, which are a part of the United States.

The proposed base is to be at Anchorage. Last year an appropriation was made for a base at Fairbanks, which is merely a part of the completed work. Anchorage is complementary to the Fairbanks base. In view of the location of the various islands and the various points in the North Pacific which are being fortified by Russia, I cannot see how there can be any other explanation than that they have the thought in mind that at some time in the future the Alaskan Territory may be available to them alone or available to joint action by Russia and Japan.

Mr. President, I think it is a most serious mistake for the Appropriations Committees of Congress to neglect this important expenditure. We have been spending billions of dollars for the purpose of creating defensive weapons; we have been spending billions of dollars for the construction of warships. Here we have a place where we are almost in direct contact with another nation that is at the present moment engaged in intense activity in constructing bases for defense, as it says, but which might easily be used for offense.

I wish to serve notice now that when the appropriation bill for military work is presented to the Senate I shall ask for the reinstatement of the item of $12,700,000 for the construction of the air base at Anchorage.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I wish to say in reference to what the Senator from Washington has said that I was a member of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House at the time the committee held hearings, and reported the so-called Wilcox bill. That bill provided for the establishment of various air bases. One of the bases which the bill authorized was the air base of which the Senator from Washington has been speaking, the base at Anchorage. We sat for a good many weeks taking testimony of all kinds, hearing from many different experts, not only experts from the War Department and the Navy Department, but experts outside these departments, and we were fully convinced that this was a very important base, one that ought to be developed without delay. As the Senator from Washington has so well shown here this afternoon, the situation today is even more compelling from the standpoint of the development of this base than it was when we had the hearings several years ago, because of the fact that Russia now has seen fit to proceed with the development of fortifications and air bases so close to the Aleutian Islands. We must remember that so far as our air defense is concerned, the farther out we can put these bases, the better off we are. If we have to fight an enemy we do not want to fight him over continental United States. We want to fight the enemy just as far away from the continental United States as possible. Therefore it is important that a base such as the proposed Anchorage base be established, far off in Alaska.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I simply wish to say to the Senator from Washington that I am in hearty accord with him in his proposal, and when he brings up the bill, if he shall bring it up soon, I shall do whatever I can in its behalf.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I appreciate what the Senator from California has said. The Senator realizes that the item will come in on the appropriation bill. I am hopeful that the Appropriations Committee of the Senate will insert this item. There is a Budget estimate for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If it is not included in the appropriation bill we will try to insert it ourselves.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. We will try. I thank the Senator from California.

Mr. President, as a part of my remarks I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point the editorial in this morning's Washington Post to which I referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington Post of Monday, April 8, 1940]

THE ANCHORAGE BASE

In eliminating an Army Budget item of $12,734,000 for the construction of an air base at Anchorage, Alaska, the House last week allowed laudable zeal for economy to ride roughshod over a vital necessity.

Alaska is far away, but the American people are now beginning to realize that this Territory may some day be called upon to play an important role in defense of the American Hemisphere. For, while most of the New World is thousands of miles removed from the islands and the mainland of Asia, at Alaska only a narrow gap of water divides the two continents and that gap can easily and quickly be bridged by airplane.

In his testimony before the House Appropriations Subcommittee, the Chief of Staff, Gen. George C. Marshall, advocated establishment of an operating air base in Alaska as a "project of major importance." He did not suggest, as the House apparently took for granted, that the landing field being completed at Fairbanks would suffice. On the contrary, since that project was undertaken the world situation, particularly developments in Asia, have shown the inadequacy of the improvements at Fairbanks. The proposed air base at Anchorage is a minimum necessity for defense of Alaska.

During recent months reports have reached Washington of intensified Russian military activity in northeastern Asia. At least three fortified areas are under construction at Kamchatka. Gun and plane installations are reported to have been completed on Sakhalin Island and the north-central shore of the Sea of Okhotsk. A naval air station has been created on the Komandorski Islands, which are only 260 miles northwest of Attu Island in the Aleutians.

To be sure, Russian activity in this area can be explained wholly in terms of its rivalry with Japan and the possibility at some time or other of a Russo-Japanese conflict. But, whatever its present purpose, the fortification of regions in Siberia not far removed from Alaska cannot be safely ignored by the United States. Nor can we close our eyes to the fact that, with Alaska relatively unprotected, an enemy might outflank the great defensive system at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, by an attack on Alaska.

Under the circumstances, the elimination of the Anchorage base item from the Army appropriations bill was unfortunate. It is to be hoped that the relatively small sum needed to begin that project will be restored by the Senate.

ATTITUDE OF AMERICA TOWARD EUROPEAN WAR

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, frankly I could not have fallen upon a more opportune hour, one more suitable for the observations I am about to make, than this. The distinguished junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER], and the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and other Senators have this afternoon made remarks on the floor of the Senate which to my ears are thoroughly inspirational and are directed toward keeping America out of the unfortunate affairs of Europe, affairs which are merely a continuation of those that have taken place there for the past 300 years, in sequence, I might add.

Furthermore, I do not believe I could have found a happier time to make mention of that which was in my mind in regard to adequate national defense, insofar as our northwestern territory is concerned. By that I mean the frontier of the United States of America which may be described by making employment of but one word, "Alaska."

The junior Senator from the State of Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] has expressed precisely my attitude in reference to appropriations for construction of bases in that particular portion of our territory, and I may say that his attitude has been backed by the distinguished junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], with whom I have the honor to serve on the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate of the United States, and likewise by the able senior Senator from the great State of California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. President, I am strongly in favor of establishing an air base at Anchorage. Everyone who is familiar with the situation pertaining to the Arctic will, in my opinion, unhesitatingly and unquestionably agree that it would be an appropriation well made and money well spent to make expenditure of the $12,700,000 which has been suggested for Anchorage, or, as some know that point to be, Dutch Harbor.

Lying across the broad waters of the Pacific is Japan, with its 97,000,000 people located on its some hundreds of islands, in Manchukuo, in parts and portions of Mongolia, and in the coastal regions of China, wherein Japan's latest conquests have been accomplished, as well as in Formosa. In view of the fact that the Japanese have evidenced that they are aggressors, we know that if ever trouble comes to us from the west it will come from Japan, and if not from Japan, trouble can come only from Soviet Russia, with its 180,000,000 Communists.

We also know that Russian territory, as a matter of fact, is only one-half mile from the territory of the United States of America. When we made purchase of Alaska many years ago for the price of $7,200,000, we made then the best purchase and the best trade that we ever made outside the great Louisiana Purchase. We purchased a vast territory, according to my recollection, of more than 700,000 square miles, which today is populated by about 60,000 people.

In the purchase of Alaska from the Russian Government at that time, when we paid $7,200,000—a mere drop in the bucket when we take into consideration the vastness of that potentially rich territory—we not only acquired the mainland of Alaska, which reaches northward from the northern line of British Columbia to Point Barrow, the northernmost point in the Western Hemisphere, and stretches from east to west in the Bering Sea, where we obtained a number of important islands from which we now derive annually several hundred thousand dollars as the result of our fur trade, but in addition we obtained the Aleutian Islands.

The Aleutian Islands, as my colleagues will very readily recall, extend from Unalaska, mentioned a moment ago by our distinguished colleague the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH], or from Dutch Harbor, to the westernmost island of Attu. They are a string of islands extending in the direction of Japan. As a matter of fact, the island of Attu is only about 2 hours by airplane from Japanese territory. I therefore say that in the interest of adequate actual national defense we should spend $12,700,000 properly to fortify our possessions by way of establishing an aviation base at Dutch Harbor or Unalaska, which are in the immediate proximity of each other; and after the establishment of such a base there we should unquestionably develop Coast Guard bases upon virtually every one of the 10 or 12 islands of considerable size between Unalaska and the island of Attu. Next year we should make a suitable appropriation for the establishment of an air base on the island of Attu. Our island of Attu is in the immediate proximity of Japan. Many Americans are afraid that in a few years we shall be involved in war with the Japanese. However, I entertain a contrary idea, because I believe that after the Japanese shall have finished their present undertaking they will not be looking for any further trouble, if they ever look for trouble in our section of the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I merely wish to observe that if we get into a war with Japan it will be solely because of the bankruptcy of statesmanship at one end of the line or the other.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Senator for that observation.

So much for our fear of Japan and suggestions as to fortifications in the immediate proximity of Japanese territory.

Let us now take into consideration what has been said by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH]. In addition to the Aleutian Islands, together with the mainland of Alaska, in the Russian purchase we acquired Little Diomede Island. There are the Little Diomede and the Big Diomede Islands. The Diomedes are to be found in the Arctic Ocean between Nome, Alaska, and Ouellen, Siberia, which is a bit to the north at an angle. The Russians own the Big Diomede, which is near the mainland of Siberia, and we own the Little Diomede, which is only a few hours' ride by boat from Nome, Alaska. The Little Diomede, which belongs to the United States, is only about one-half mile from the Big Diomede, which is owned by Soviet Russia. Therefore, the territory of the United States is separated from the territory of Russia by only half a mile of water.

On the north of the Diomedes we find Wrangell Island. Wrangell Island is about 60, 75, or 80 miles in length. There is a fine harbor there. It can be very well used for an airplane base. In view of the fact that it is in immediate proximity to Russian territory, and particularly Siberia, that portion of the Soviet Union where so many Russians are being sent from the East—that is to say, Odessa, Moscow, Stalingrad, and Leningrad—for the purpose of gold-mining and agriculture, I am of the opinion that we should now ascertain for ourselves the status of the ownership of Wrangell Island.

Historians claim that the first flag of any nation ever to be placed upon Wrangell Island was placed there around 1862 by Captain De Long, or some of his associates on the Jeannette Expedition. From time to time we have in a sense claimed possession of the island, but I understand that the island is now in the possession of some Siberian Eskimos and about a dozen Soviet soldiers, who are claiming possession and saying that we are not now entitled to possession, in view of the fact that they have been pleased to apply the statute of limitations.

If one should fly an airplane from New York to Manila, one would of necessity pass directly over Wrangell Island. Twenty-five years from now, Wrangell Island will be one of the most important bases in all the world for us and for the Russians for the reason that it is located only a short distance from our Alaskan Territory and, on the other hand, only a short distance from Siberian territory, and particularly that part of Siberian territory which Stalin's commerce department is now endeavoring to populate by sending great numbers from the east to that section of that vast empire, which covers one-sixth of the entire surface of the earth.

Some day we may become involved with Russia. One never knows. We do not know what will happen in the future, and I think it would be well now to call upon our State Department to ascertain the legal status of Wrangell Island. I am of the opinion that we can establish legal ownership thereof.

Mr. President, rather than take up the time of the Senate, this morning in my office I dictated a description of Wrangell Island and something about its history and the facts concerning certain expeditions in the immediate proximity thereof. I ask that the statement which I prepared about Wrangell Island be published in the Appendix of the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Wrangell Island is about the size and area of Jamaica, which is just south of Cuba. I think we ought to have Jamaica for the protection of the Western Hemisphere under the Monroe Doctrine, and particularly for the protection of the Panama Canal. Certainly we ought to have it if we are to spend an additional $300,000,000 to establish a second set of locks in the Panama Canal, about which I heard some conversation this morning in the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article which appeared in the Washington Post of February 26, 1939, in respect to some arguments upon the floor of the Senate last year, when Wrangell Island was mentioned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Preceding my statement in regard to Wrangell Island and the article from the Washington Post, I should like to have printed in the RECORD the resolution which I now submit, and which reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is requested to make a report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date with respect to whether or not the United States has a valid claim to sovereignty over Wrangell Island.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution submitted by the Senator from North Carolina (S. Res. 253) will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and will also be printed in the Appendix, as requested.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, as I stated a moment ago, I am of the opinion that we can establish legal ownership of Wrangell Island, which will be tremendously valuable within a few years if a controversy should arise and this matter were turned over to some international body, committee, or court. In that event it might be shown that the property is now that of the Russians by way of occupancy. We might suggest to the Russians that they let us have the island in liquidation of their indebtedness to the United States of America.

My recollection is that prior to the time the Russians took over half of Poland, just a few months ago, the Russian Government owed us more than $300,000,000.

Mr. ASHURST. Nearly $400,000,000.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Nearly $400,000,000. I am very grateful to my distinguished friend, the Senator from Arizona. In addition to that, since the Russians took two-thirds, or certainly more than one-half, of Poland a few months ago they, I think, should be called upon to assume the Polish debt; and the Poles at that time owed us about $300,000,000 or some such sum. In view of the fact that the Russians took over a large portion of Poland, lock, stock, and barrel, they must, of necessity, assume at least half of the Polish indebtedness to the United States at the time they took it over. Therefore, the Russians owe us $150,000,000 on that account, which would make a total of $450,000,000, and the Germans owe us $150,000,000. I hope we will be able to collect from both of them.

Mr. President, the remarks of distinguished Senators a moment ago on the flag of our great country and the vivid description given by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] of the thousands of uniformed men parading under arms so majestically on last Saturday, April 6, within the shadow of this great Capitol Dome, reminded me that 23 years ago last Saturday the United States Congress declared war upon Germany. I recall reading in the columns of the local press the very vivid description of that parade of last Saturday, which, unfortunately, I was not able to see. At the end of one of the newspaper stories there was a paragraph of about four lines that struck me with more force than anything I have read in the newspapers, interesting itself, in geniune Americanism. There were three or four lines which fell from the lips of one of the greatest patriots, one of the greatest statesmen this country has ever known or will ever know so long as we remain a republic. I wish the statement of that great statesman, of that great beloved man, could reach the ears of every single mother of America who will be called upon to give her son's life in case we should become involved in the European war, because if those few words could be brought to the attention of the mothers of our land there would never be participation by America in Europe's squabbles, according to the desires of Mr. William Frederic Wile, columnist of the Evening Star.

What were the words of that patriot who does me the high honor to listen at this hour, and who provides me with inspiration at this moment when I speak of my country, the Honorable GEORGE W. NORRIS, the senior Senator from the great State of Nebraska, when according to my recollection, he said in remarking about that parade that there should be mourning crepe on the highways. Doubtless a number of other Senators read the statement of the distinguished patriot from Nebraska.

I am regretful to state that there are people in this country today who believe it to be the duty of the United States of America to spill the red, ripe, racing blood of our sons upon foreign fields at this hour; but there is one man in the Senate toward whom I am looking now and from whom I am deriving my inspiration, the only living Member of the Senate who voted on April 6, 1917, not to send the sons of American mothers to Europe to stop all wars for all time, to rescue Christianity and save democracy, and that one man in America today above all, thank God, GEORGE W. NORRIS, has lived to see the fallacy of our participating in the quarrels of Europe then, which, prior thereto, had continued for more than 300 years. Thank God for that patriot!

I want to say, in perfect frankness, that, for the life of me, I cannot yet understand and do not know what they are fighting for over yonder in Europe. Certainly England and France have not declared war on Germany because Germany aggressed upon and conquered Czechoslovakia and old Austria, and parts of Poland, because, if that had been the reason for France and England to declare war, France and England would have declared war upon Russia, because Russia took the lives of thousands upon thousands of people of Finland when Russian soldiers bombed the women and children of the populations of the section where war was raging.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. While I would not take from the distinguished Senator from Nebraska one iota of credit for the many achievements which he has performed for the benefit of the people of the country, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska or the Senator from North Carolina, if, perhaps, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN], who now serves in the Senate, did not also cast a vote against America's participation in the war in 1917?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am very happy to answer that question. I said a moment ago that our distinguished and beloved friend, the Senator from Nebraska, was the only living Member of this body who voted against war; but another distinguished colleague of ours, the junior Senator from Minnesota, the Honorable ERNEST LUNDEEN—and I am very grateful to my delightful friends for mentioning the incident—at that time, April 6, 1917, was a Member of the House of Representatives, and he, too, voted against our participation in the war. Since the junior Senator from Kentucky has mentioned that, it might be interesting for him to learn that at that time this country was burned up with propaganda of all sorts in the effort to get us into the war, and a man then, of course, of necessity, had to be possessed of a great deal of courage and daring to resist that propaganda, for propaganda is more deadly than all the swords in the world; as the Senator knows "the pen is mightier than the sword."

I am told upon good authority that propaganda was so strong in this country, and feeling so ablaze and aflame, that when the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN] went back to Minnesota and proceeded to his law office and sat down, it was not long until a mob came, dragged him out of his office, placed a rope around his neck, yelled, "Hang him"; brought his furniture out on to the street, saturated it with oil, lighted and destroyed it, and ran him out of town; and he was lucky to escape with his life. But the years passed, and the American people realized that they had been tricked, and that our participation in the war had not ended all war for all time, spared Christianity, or saved democracy, and they recognized the fact that they had done to the Senator from Minnesota, Mr. LUNDEEN, a great injustice.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think the Senator's expression that the American people had been "tricked" into war ought to be allowed to go unchallenged. There are many Members of the present Congress who were here at that time, and I happen to be one of them. I was a Member of the House of Representatives at the time. I voted on the 6th of April, 1917, for the joint resolution which acknowledged a state of war which was already in existence because of the ravages of the German Government upon American lives and property.

Many men had honest differences as to the wisdom of that course. I share the Senator's encomiums upon the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and other Senators and Members of the House who had the courage to vote against the declaration of war; but the declaration of war occurred 2 years after President Wilson had done everything within the range of human possibility to persuade the German Government not to violate the rights of the American people, and it is not quite fair to say that we were tricked into a declaration of war. We entered the war in defense of a policy which for 100 years and more, ever since the War of 1812, the American people had not only declared and advocated, but had been willing to fight for.

Whether that may now be considered a mistake is a matter for anybody to satisfy his own conscience about. It is sufficient to say that when the present war came on we were not willing even to take the chance of sustaining and defending the rights of the American people, the violation of which had caused us to enter the war in 1917. It is my belief that by the enactment of the Neutrality Act which is now the law, keeping our people out of the war zones, keeping our flag from the belligerent territories, keeping our ships away, and preventing our people and our commerce from entering regions which for 100 years they have always been supposed to have the right to enter, we have made at this time a proper and yet the greatest sacrifice that any nation ever made to avoid war.

I am thoroughly in sympathy with that policy. I think the European war which we entered cost us infinitely more than we could ever get out of it by any stretch of the imagination, and that while we are making sacrifices to keep out of this war, those sacrifices will not be as great and are not as great as those we would make if we should get into it; and I am in sympathy with everything anybody says or does to keep us out of this war.

Surely, however, the Senator from North Carolina did not mean that those of us who felt that under our oaths of office, under the leadership of the great President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson, we should vote for a declaration of war, had tricked the American people into the war; and I do not think it is quite accurate to say, also, that the American people got into the war because of propaganda.

Of course there was propaganda. There is no very accurate definition of propaganda. What anybody writes about anything may be described as propaganda; but the thing which dragged us into the war and made the American people finally willing to go into it was the outrages committed against our people, the murder of American citizens against all the protests of the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, and Congress, and everybody else.

I do not think my good friend the Senator from North Carolina meant by what he said to the effect that we were tricked into the war, to intimate that Congress, or the President, or the people themselves who felt that that was the only course we could pursue, had tricked anybody into a declaration of war.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Senator very much. I am really, genuinely very happy that our leader, the Senator from Kentucky, took occasion to make those observations now, for fear someone might have misconstrued my remarks. Of course, it would be far from me, as the Senator knows, to cast the slightest reflection upon any man in this body. It was simply a question of opinion. I believe that every Member of this body always votes his conscientious convictions. Some of us divided on the question of neutrality. Some of us were for lifting the embargo; some of us were against it; but we all know that we were entirely conscientious, and were voting our conscientious convictions. So, if anything I said would lead anybody to believe to the slightest degree that I had in the slightest way cast an aspersion or insinuation upon any Member of this body or of the other body of Congress, I want that thought eliminated; and I thank the Senator from Kentucky very much.

Mr. President, I have before me extracts from the columns of the Washington Star of Friday last, by the pen of Mr. Frederic William Wile. I desire to read to you his remarks, and make comments thereupon. Then I want to compare what he says with the attitude taken by the Scandinavian countries. In making that comparison I believe I shall be able to show that Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, the Scandinavian lands in the immediate vicinity of the warring factions, are not only desirous of keeping out of the present European squabble, but they are going to keep out of it; whereas on the other hand in this country, 3,000 miles away from the base of conflict, there are persons in the capital of our country who are insisting that we get into the war.

Let me read parts of this article and see about that. After Mr. Wile had commented upon the primary election which took place in Wisconsin the other day, in which our friends President Roosevelt, Vice President Garner, District Attorney Dewey, and the Senator from Michigan, Mr. Vandenberg, were involved, he said:

> In other words, the suggestion is ventured that nationally significant as these local political developments may be, they are small potatoes alongside the issue which demands vastly more of the United States attention, viz, the danger that Germany may win the European war. Such a disquieting possibility is reluctantly but realistically envisioned in authoritative American quarters. Its implications and perils for the Western Hemisphere overshadow the Presidential campaign as completely as the Washington Monument obscures Steve the Greek's White House popcorn and peanut stand.
> Whether the next President's name is Roosevelt or Dewey, whether the Budget is balanced, whether or not farm-parity prices are fixed, whether the relief allotment is $1,000,000,000 or $2,000,000,000, whether the Hull reciprocal-trade agreements should or should not have congressional approval, whether officeholders should participate in politics, whether the next House has a Democratic or Republican majority—I contend that no one of these issues, or all of them put together, today amount to a hill of beans, compared to what will happen to us and the rest of the world if the Nazis defeat Great Britain and France.
> Even without HAM FISH, of New York, and BOB REYNOLDS, of North Carolina, screaming isolationist sophistries from the Capitol rooftop, it is difficult enough to persuade the American people to extend their international thinking beyond the 3-mile limit, or to contemplate the world in terms of anything but the next 30 or 60 days. Until someone with a claim on the country's ear and without November votes in mind thinks up a more vertebrate sentiment than "stay out of war at any cost," the chances are slender that we shall be pried loose from the fool's paradise we now inhabit, cease imitating the ostrich, and generally act like men instead of mice.

In other words, Mr. Frederic William Wile says we are acting like mice instead of like men. He says the American people are a lot of ostriches, sticking their heads in the sand so that they cannot see what the world sees, and Mr. Frederic William Wile says we should do something about it.

I disagree with Mr. Wile. He says we are living in a fool's paradise, because we cannot see beyond the length of our noses; because we cannot envision anything beyond the declared 3-mile limit from American shores. In other words, Mr. Wile says that we should all become interventionists, that we should all become internationalists, that we should go over there now, that we should send American sons to man the guns which we have already sent and are now sending. Mr. Frederic William Wile said we are living in a fool's paradise while we continue to assume the position we now are assuming.

Mr. President, before Mr. Frederic William Wile wrote that he should have consulted the poll which, I am informed, was taken by the Ladies' Home Journal of the mothers of America, the result of which was that more than 90 percent of the mothers of American boys voted to stay out of this war. The mothers are going to control the Nation. Despite what Mr. Frederic William Wile say, I cannot help but believe that the mothers are right and that Mr. Wile is wrong.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the Senator think that there are more real Americans in this country, including fathers and mothers, than there are Wiles, or does he not?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes; Mr. President, there are a great many more. But, I wish to say to my distinguished friend, the Senator from Missouri, that there are many Wiles in this country. Like the Senator from Missouri, I read many magazines, I read many newspapers, and letters which are sent to the public forums published in the various newspapers throughout the country. Thousands and thousands of people in the United States today believe that right now this Government, our Democracy, should send its young boys to Europe to be murdered, and to bleed to death upon foreign fields, in order to save the situation for some other country.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I agree with the Senator that there are certain very potent forces moving in this country in the way the Senator suggests. My only thought is that the Senator is attaching too much importance to an exploded, old interventionist such as Frederic William Wile.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Senator. I probably should not even have given Mr. Wile the credit of recognition, but I thought it would provide me with an excellent opportunity to bring to the attention of the Members of this body the widespread propaganda which is honeycombing this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the heavily timbered forests of Michigan to the pine-clad slopes of Florida.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. I have been listening with a great deal of attention to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, and my only contribution to this subject is that I think he is doing a fine work in demolishing the very idea that Frederic William Wile has brought into the open. I cannot agree with the distinguished Senator who just spoke that the Senator from North Carolina is attaching too much importance to that matter, for the reason that Saturday night at an Army Day banquet I heard substantially the same sentiments spoken by an Army officer.

Mr. President, the trouble is that such persons are endeavoring to cause the American people to become conscious of something which is not a fact. In the first place, England and France are not going under. In the next place, these persons draw the conclusion that if England and France should go under we could better the position of America and the position of the mothers of America and their sons by intervening. That in itself is a wrong conclusion.

Mr. President, what we must do is simply to see that people everywhere keep their mental apparatus working calmly. That is the point I wanted to make. I believe that the American people should keep calm, no matter what may happen in the future. Last night at midnight the voice of Europe spoke again of oncoming events that will be tremendous in their significance. When they do come on, if we remain calm and not subject to hysteria, we shall see the clear American way.

The Senator suggested that we were tricked back in 1917. I cannot agree to that, but I can agree that we were blinded back in the days of 1917, thinking we were going to save the world for democracy, and we went out and shed our blood, and gave our money without getting anything in return.

The best part of it is that now we know that one war does not prevent another war. So if we can keep America thinking straight we will go straight.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator very much, and I think he has stated the situation very plainly and clearly. It looks to me as though we were rather blinded into entering the last war. Our Representatives in Congress conscientiously felt—we all did, as a matter of fact, whether we were in Congress or not—that by entering that war we would stop all wars for all time. We felt that we would thereby save Christianity and save democracy. But fortunately for this hour and for this time, the passage of time has revealed to us that we were blinded to the situation, and that our participation did not have the result which our brothers across the sea told us it would.

Let us see about that. It did not stop all wars, for since the World War, Italy conquered about 15,000,000 people in Ethiopia. Since the World War there raged in Paraguay and Bolivia a tremendous war which took as its toll about eight-tenths of the male population. In addition to that there raged a civil war in Spain which began in July 1936, and lasted until last year, in which more than 2,000,000 people were killed. In addition to that, there has raged in Asia a war between the Japanese and the Chinese, and up to date more than 1,000,000 Japanese have been killed, and more than 3,000,000 Chinese have been killed, and more than 100,000,000 Chinese have been rendered homeless out of a population of from 450,000,000 to 500,000,000. So much for the hope of ending all wars. Our intervention did not do so.

Furthermore, our intervention certainly did not result in sparing the temples of God, because in Russia every single one was razed to the ground. The same thing took place in Spain during the raging of the civil war there. And as for democracy, since the World War it has been much weaker.

Speaking of democracy, I wish to say that, in my humble opinion, if we are sucked into the present war in Europe, democracy in this country will be destroyed.

Referring to the great American flag, as did the able junior Senator from Kentucky a moment ago, that flag of red, white, and blue, which provides the inspiration for all Americans, I much prefer to see that flag upon the soil of America than elsewhere. I do not desire to see that flag leading regiments of young Americans to their death and to their destruction in Europe, and to the destruction of democracy in the United States of America.

But Mr. Frederic William Wile says that we ought to go over there now, that it is our duty to do so, that we are living in a fool's paradise, and we are like ostriches.

What did he say further?

Winston Churchill, now civilian generalissimo of Britain's combined fighting services, might have had our FISHES, REYNOLDES, NYES, TINKHAMS et al. in mind the other day when he said: "There are thoughtless, dilettante, or purblind worldlings who sometimes ask, What is it that Britain and France are fighting for? To this I answer: 'If we left off fighting, you would soon find out.'" Britain and France do not intend to leave off fighting until every free nation in Europe is liberated from the grip of insecurity and fear. The Allies believe that even distant and disinterested bystanders, like ourselves, in the event of Nazi victory, would soon be confronted by the jungle law for which Hitlerism stands. It is for that reason that Ontario's attorney general dares to suggest that "Canada's duty is to do everything within her power to enlist the active support of the United States in the cause of the Allies." This observer—believes millions of Americans share corresponding views, are only waiting for courageous and farsighted leadership to beat their sentiments into deeds.

In other words, Mr. Wile tells the mothers of America that they and their husbands, the parents of American children, who should serve as cannon fodder, are ostriches. He also says that America is looking for a courageous leader; that some man of courage should rise in all his might and lead the youth of America to slaughter upon foreign shores.

Mr. President, let us see what that gentleman, the attorney general of Ontario, had to say. I read from an article which was sent to me:

URGES CANADA TO ENLIST AID OF UNITED STATES IN WAR

CANNINGTON, ONTARIO, April 3.—The Ontario attorney general, Gordon Conant, today told an audience of farmers and businessmen that it is Canada's duty to "do everything within our power to enlist the active support of the United States in the cause of the Allies."

Saying the success of the allied cause "may be very doubtful" unless active participation of the United States is made effective at an early date, Conant declared:

"No sacrifice on our part will be too great if that can be accomplished."

In other words, Mr. Conant, the attorney general of Ontario, insists that the United States participate actively, which means physically.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. HOLT. Does not the Senator think more of the attorney general of Ontario for that statement than he does of certain people in the United States who are trying to get us into the war? Mr. Conant's country is in the war, and there are some individuals in the United States who are trying to get us in, and have no particular basis for their effort like that on which Mr. Conant stands.

Let me say that if I thought as Mr. Wile thinks—that there was a battle on to save the world for democracy—and I believed in that, I would be the first man to enlist and go over instead of sending some boy. But I imagine that when the time comes he will claim exemption on the ground of his age.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I have never had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Wile. I occasionally read his column. He is very fluent with the pen, but this is a time when I cannot agree with him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, in line with what the Senator from West Virginia has said, I might suggest that, while Mr. Wile might be too old to lead the boys to slaughter on this occasion, we have had war several times in the history of the United States during Mr. Wile's lifetime—at least twice, when he probably was of military age, in 1898 and 1917. If the Senator knows of Mr. Wile leading anybody to slaughter anywhere, I should like to have him recall the occasion.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I do not know of Mr. Wile leading anybody to slaughter.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator's suggestion was that the articles of Mr. Wile were calculated to develop the fact that there was no great leader to lead anybody to slaughter. Mr. Wile had two chances before to lead soldiers to slaughter.

Mr. REYNOLDS. He had an opportunity, and perhaps did not take advantage of it.

In reply to what the Senator from West Virginia has said, of course, we must be perfectly honest and frank about these things. I do not really blame Mr. Conant. Mr. Conant is a Canadian; his first love is for the British Government, and if we were Canadians we would endeavor likewise to enlist the services of the American people, and secure the material aid of the American Government, knowing, as they know, that we are the most powerful Nation upon the face of the earth. But the point upon which I lay stress by way of directing criticism to Mr. Wile, if I may, is that Mr. Wile says that Mr. Conant is right when Mr. Conant says that they should do everything they possibly can to get the United States into the trouble, and to participate in the war.

Mr. HOLT. In other words, Mr. President, does not the Senator feel that the real danger from propaganda is because of American propagandists, who are sailing under American citizenship colors, trying to get us into a foreign war where we have no business?

Mr. REYNOLDS. This is real, genuine propaganda, designed for the purpose of getting us into the war. Mr. Wile says that we are ostriches; that we are living in a fool's paradise; that we should have sense enough to see beyond the end of our noses; that we should have sense enough to get out of this condition and look across the seas. He virtually says that we should send all our forces over there to help.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. CHANDLER. My distinguished friend speaks so eloquently that I always sit near him and listen to him. The thing that will offset this propaganda is a continuation of speeches such as those the distinguished Senator makes here. I imagine that every night all over America mothers whose boys would have to go to war, when many of the fellows who write would not have to go, and do not expect to go, ponder what the Senator says. It is all right with these writers to let someone else's boy go, but if the Senator will keep reassuring the mothers of America that they will not have to send their boys across the ocean again, he will have more stars added to his crown.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am very grateful for that extremely high tribute paid me by my distinguished friend from Kentucky. I say with genuine sincerity that I am sure no greater tribute could possibly be paid me than the one which has just fallen from his eloquent lips.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. HOLT. If the Senator would not object, I should like to read from Saturday's Times-Herald about Mr. Conant's speech. The English had no objection to his making those remarks, but they did not want him to be caught making them. May I read from the statement?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. HOLT. I read:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of Saturday, April 6, 1940]

BRITISH "HUSH" IDEA IT'S UNITED STATES DUTY TO FIGHT—WANT FACTS TO SPEAK FOR THEMSELVES

(By Don Campbell)

LONDON, April 5.—On the eve of the twenty-third anniversary of the United States entrance into the World War the British Government tonight put the "hush-hush" on any suggestions it is America's duty to enter the present war on the side of the Allies.

Nevertheless American sentiment on the question of entering or staying out of the war is one of the chief topics of discussion, and that is why thousands of Britons are following the course of the Presidential race in the United States with almost as much interest as if they were electing their own Prime Minister.

SOFT PEDAL ON PRESSURE

They want to know whether President Roosevelt will seek a third term, whether an Allied sympathizer will get the nomination, and whether the American isolationists will come out on top.

But the government, in accordance with Downing Street instructions, is soft-pedaling arguments on the question of whether the United States is bound by moral and humanitarian responsibilities to line up with Britain and France.

Too much high-pressure salesmanship of the Allied cause, the British have found, only generates sales resistance among the American people.

Agitation along the lines of America's "duty" have backfired in too many instances.

The new British policy is that the Allies have an excellent case, strong enough to win American support, and the facts should be allowed to speak for themselves.

In this connection the Ontario speech of Attorney General Gordon Conant saying it was the duty of Canada to do everything to draw the United States into the war on the Allied side was at odds with the official British policy. Britain has no power to dictate the policy of a Canadian or Ontario official.

FIGHTING FOR DEMOCRACY

Nevertheless, there is no reason to suppose Conant's speech was unwelcome because it provided a further opportunity to sound out American opinion without incurring any official British responsibility.

Furthermore, the Canadians are in a far better position to urge the United States to join the war than the British because, as Britons say of the Canadians, "they, too, are Americans helping the cause of the democracies in Europe."

"We are fighting for democracy and therefore we are fighting the war for the United States as well as for ourselves," many Britons complain.

HOPE UNITED STATES WILL FIGHT

The British hope that if the war becomes a long struggle and the Allies are hard pressed the United States will join in to prevent a German victory. They eagerly seize upon any suggestions or indications supporting this hope.

It is admitted generally in London that so long as the war remains unsettled, there is scant chance of bringing about any shift in American isolationist opinion.

Nevertheless the British frequently draw a parallel between now and 1916, in the days before the United States' entrance into the war 23 years ago tomorrow.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am very much obliged to the Senator. I might remind him that it is my recollection, and probably also his, that after we sent our boys over during the World War they said, "You came too late." That is my information.

At the outset I stated that I was going to make a comparison between the attitude of Mr. Frederic William Wile and the attitude of representatives of the Scandinavian countries. Mr. Frederic William Wile lives in Washington, D. C., in the Capital of our country. He is a fluent writer, he is a well-known newspaper columnist. Mr. Frederic William Wile says that we should get into the war now, that we are living in a fool's paradise not to, and that we should send our young boys "over there" to die. For what? Not for democracy, not for Christianity, not to stop all world wars; but the "come-on" cry now is, "Come in to create a new world order." That does not have the ring the old "come-on" cries had—"save democracy; save Christianity; stop all wars for all time." Of course, such a cry appeals to all Christian people in the United States.

I have just spoken of Christians—God-fearing, God-loving people. I cut an article from a newspaper this morning headed "Joint church stand against war urged." It looks to me as if not only the Christian mothers but the other church-going people are against Mr. Wile in this matter. Mr. Wile says that the church-going people of America are wrong. Mr. Wile says that the Christian people are wrong—that they are living in a fool's paradise. Let us see. I have stated what the mothers have said. The mothers said, "No, Mr. Wile; we are not going to send our sons over there, because we love our boys." Let us see what the good church people say in answer to Mr. Wile:

JOINT CHURCH STAND AGAINST WAR URGED—DR. PRETTYMAN HONORED ON EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY

Joint action by all American churches to keep this country out of foreign wars was urged yesterday by Dr. John F. B. Carruthers, of Pasadena, Calif., at the Church of the Covenant.

As an overflow crowd listened to his peace appeal, the wartime chaplain of the Senate, Dr. Forrest J. Prettyman, was honored in another church, the Emory Methodist, on his eightieth birthday.

ONCE A PASTOR HERE

Dr. Carruthers, a former assistant pastor of Covenant Church, declared he considered his antiwar sermon as timely because it came the day after the twenty-third anniversary of America's entry into the World War.

On April 6, 1917, the clergyman said, "the attitude of church and state on the necessity for war was the same."

"But times have changed," he added.

"Today, the church, with its 50,000,000 members and some 200,000 clergymen, will have to part with any government that would send our youth across the ocean to take part in an armed conflict.

MUST TAKE STAND

"If the church in America, as a leading force in governmental principles of American commonwealth, refused to take a stand against participation of the United States in a foreign war, it might as well be dead and buried as far as spiritual influence with our youth is concerned."

Dr. Prettyman, the father of E. Barrett Prettyman, former corporation counsel here, was lauded on his long service to humanity and the Nation by Daniel C. Roper, former Secretary of Commerce, and by Dr. Horace E. Cromer, pastor of Emory Church.

Dr. Prettyman was chaplain of the Senate during the administrations of Presidents Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson.

Our good friend, Frederic William Wile, says we should send our sons over there to be slaughtered for Great Britain and for France. But the mothers of America say "No." Mr. Frederic William Wile says that the mothers and the church people of this country are wrong. But 50,000,000 Christian church people say Mr. Frederic William Wile is wrong. Whom do I prefer to believe? I prefer to believe the mothers of America and the 50,000,000 Christians who attend church every Sunday, rather than to believe the warmonger, the man who would bring death to the sons of America to satisfy his hatred for Hitler and Germany.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I gladly yield.

Mr. HOLT. Would it not be far better if the individuals who want American boys to die for an ideal should join the Foreign Legion and fight for the ideal, instead of sending some other boys across?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. HOLT. They may join the Foreign Legion of France.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly. There is nothing illegal about it. I do not think the State Department has taken any action to prohibit it. Certainly they may go to Canada and enlist, or they may go to Algiers, which is a French colony, or to any of the Allied countries, and enlist.

Mr. HOLT. Does the Senator know of any propagandists who are accepting pay for their writings who have enlisted in active service?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I noticed in a newspaper a couple of days ago that American aviators are being sought and offered high prices to enlist in Europe. I had the clipping in my office, and intended to bring it with me.

Getting back to the comparison of attitudes, I have told the Senate about Frederic William Wile. He wants to get us into war. He is right here in our Capital. Let us see the difference between the attitude of Mr. Frederic William Wile, an American citizen who wants to get his own country into war, and the attitude of representatives of countries within a stone's throw of Germany. We are 3,000 miles away from the war, and yet many persons are afraid we are going to be in it. Many persons want to get us into it. The letters in the public forum columns of the press say that we ought to go over there.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. Wile ought to define the word "we" as meaning someone else, when he says "we" ought to go over there. He is not speaking in the first person.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I think the Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. President, let us see the attitude of the representatives of the Scandinavian governments. We recall that Norway, Sweden, and Denmark did not get into the last World War. They were within a stone's throw of the war for more than 4 years, and they did not get into it. We were 3,000 miles away, but we got into it. Norway, Sweden, and Denmark are today within a stone's throw of a repetition of the same thing, and they are not going to get into it. Let us see what their representatives say about it, in order to compare attitudes. I want the Senate to listen very carefully to this. This article is entitled "Norway Defies Allied Blockade; Warns of War. Oslo Vows to Fight for Independence."

OSLO, NORWAY, April 6.—Premier Johan Nygaardsvold and Foreign Minister Halvdan Koht today strongly reemphasized the determination of Norway to carry on normal trade with belligerent nations, to defend this nation's neutrality and to avoid any one-sided action by which "our country would be immediately involved in war."

Their statements assumed particular significance as a result of delivery of communications from Great Britain and France regarding the Allied interest in the position of Scandinavia toward Germany and Russia and of statements at Berlin that the Nazis were watching the alleged efforts of the Allies to force Norway and Sweden to aid the blockade of the Reich.

Judging from the way this man talks he must be a statesman, because his remarks impress me as coming from a man who is interested in the people of Norway and only in the people of Norway. What does he say?

POSITION OF NATION

Three developments outlined Norway's position:

1. Koht, speaking to Parliament, said Norway was not interested in aiding any belligerent, that she would fight only for her liberty and independence and that "our country would immediately be in the war" if Norway contradicted her own neutrality policy by favoring one side or the other. He said he did not believe Britain would violate Norwegian neutrality.

This statesman is interested in Norwegians, and not in Germans, British, French, or anybody else.

2. Nygaardsvold, in an interview with the United Press, said he believed the belligerents "understand that we must carry on normal trade relations with all sides and that they must respect international law regarding our territorial waters."

3. The newspaper Sjoefarts Tidende said Norway could disprove any Allied charges that she had abused her neutrality and that Norwegian and British representatives should meet to exchange opinions on questions raised by the Allied communication to Norway and Sweden.

STRESSES NEUTRALITY

Koht's speech before Parliament was devoted to emphasizing the neutral position of Norway despite pressure from both Allies and Germany, and it was taken to mean the Government was determined to avoid involvement in the conflict except in extreme circumstances that would threaten this country's independence. Such a policy was regarded as meaning that Norway would oppose with armed force any violation of her neutrality, but even if such an incident occurs she would still try to limit it to an incident and avoid being drawn into war.

In this connection one passage of the foreign minister's speech was of particular importance. He said:

ONLY STRIVES FOR PEACE

"If the Allies should demand that we halt our general independent trade and cooperation which is now being carried on according to international law and which we ourselves by our own desires have confirmed, then it would either be terrible for them, or, if we favor one side, it would be in open contradiction to the neutrality which we are obliged to maintain. Thus our country would be immediately involved in war."

It was against any one-sided action which would result in Norway being "immediately involved in war" that Koht warned.

Norway, he said, is not interested in who wins the war and is only striving to maintain her neutrality and keep out.

Listen to this statement. He is interested only in his people. Let me repeat:

Norway, he said, is not interested in who wins the war and is only striving to maintain her neutrality and keep out.

"Norway has never been interested in joining any belligerent in a great war," he continued. "I emphasize that the Norwegian Government also in its commercial policy has strictly maintained a neutral attitude, and we desire to retain trade connections with all countries. We are trying to maintain a normal, peacetime level of our trade with foreign countries.

"So far no belligerent has charged that Norway has been unneutral, except Germany in the City of Flint incident.

"However, as soon as Germany was informed by the Norwegian Government they opined that Norway's attitude was satisfactory."

SWEDEN CLINGS TO NEUTRALITY

STOCKHOLM, SWEDEN, April 6.—Scandinavia steeled itself tonight to withstand Allied and German pressure that aroused the gravest fears for the neutrality of Norway and Sweden.

Official and private sources in Stockholm and Oslo no longer attempt to conceal their concern. Unconfirmed rumors were adding to the tension which was brought to a head by a communication from Great Britain and France and by German warnings that Scandinavia must resist any pressure to aid the Allied blockade of the Reich.

Both Sweden and Norway emphasized they were determined to maintain the strictest neutrality and acknowledged that any one-sided action regarding trade with the belligerents would be almost certain to draw them into the war.

In Oslo, Premier Johan Nygaardsvold declared Norway would insist on carrying on normal trade with both Germany and Britain, and in Stockholm official circles said that Sweden adopted the same attitude.

Mr. President, this morning, in the Washington Times-Herald, I read one of the finest editorials I ever read in my life. Evidently it was originally published in the editorial columns of the New York Daily News, because in italics at the bottom is the notation "Copyright, 1940, News Syndicate Co., Inc."

I shall not take the time to read the entire editorial to the Senate, but I hope every Member of this body will read it, because it is one of the finest I have ever read. The editorial is entitled "Invincible Uncle Sam," and it concludes with these words:

For Uncle Sam, the best advice ever thought up is still "Mind your own business"—by staying home and cultivating democracy in a land which cannot be successfully attacked as long as its people do mind their own business.

There never was a truer saying upon the face of the earth. Instead of going over to Europe to fight for democracy against communism, I think we ought to stay at home and fight against communism in this country, for the maintenance and continued life of democracy.

Mr. President, in addition to asking that this very excellent editorial be published at this juncture in my remarks, I ask also that the printed words in italics preceding the editorial be printed, because they are a warning that we should hear every day. They are from George Washington, the Father of his Country. What does he say?

Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other.

Mr. President, as we all recall, those words are from the Farewell Address of the Father of his Country, who, fortunately for this land then and now, was possessed of good old common horse sense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the editorial will be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial is as follows:

INVISIBLE UNCLE SAM

Americans who want us to go directly or indirectly into the European war on the Allied side split up into two main schools of thought.

There are the idealists who, like Woodrow Wilson and his friends in 1917, feel that we ought to fight because democracy somewhere in the world is in danger, and in order to bring about "a firm, just, and lasting peace."

That sounds too much like old times. It is a mere rewrite of the 1917–18 slogans about "making the world safe for democracy" (which we didn't do), and fighting "a war to end war"—which war ended only in an infirm, unjust peace which lasted 3 months short of 21 years.

The other school of interventionist thought is the more practical one, if you accept its major premise.

This school believes that if Germany and Russia win this war our own country will be in danger of conquest by this alliance of totalitarian nations. Hence, this school feels that it would be much better and cheaper for us to fight for democracy on French, Scandinavian, and Asiatic fronts now than to chance having to fight for its defense on our own territory at some later time.

The chief trouble with this second class of interventionists, we believe, is that their major premise is wrong. We don't think American democracy is in such danger as all that.

WILL EXHAUSTED NATIONS FIGHT?

For one thing, the Germans, if they win this war at all, are 999 chances to 1 not going to win it by any such relatively cheap blitzkrieg as they performed in Poland. It promises to be a long, exhausting, and costly war for all concerned. Afterward, it will be a long time before the power politicians of the victorious nation or nations can persuade their people to go off on some new adventure of conquest, not to mention getting up the money and the materials for same.

For another and more important thing, we believe that if the Germans and any conceivable post-war allies of Germany should try an attack on the United States, we could lick the whole combination.

We have a huge land area to begin with, for the absorption and gradual killing off of any expeditionary forces that may be able to get a foothold on our shores.

Look at what the Chinese are doing to the Japanese.

AN INVASION—IS IT POSSIBLE?

But could any enemy even get an invasion of this country well started?

We have a network of the world's best motor roads, and about 30,000,000 automobiles at the present writing to travel on them. We have the best railroad system in the world. With these facilities, we could shuttle armies back and forth from coast to coast to meet any invaders, and welcome them with bloody hands to hospitable graves.

Our factories can turn out airplanes faster than any other nation's factories can; we have a big Navy to be beaten before the would-be invader can set foot on our coast line. Our natural resources make us almost self-sustaining, so that even an airtight blockade of the United States would be at worst inconvenient.

All of which adds up to this: That the United States on its home territory is invincible.

We are not, however, invincible when it comes to sticking our neck out where we have no business doing so.

HOW WE CAN BE BEATEN

Send an expeditionary force to Scandinavia, or the western front, or the front which may be forming in the Near East and the Balkans, and we can lose most or all of those men just as easily as any other nation can. Try to fight Japan on a sea front including the Philippines and Guam, and we can be trimmed by Japan, and probably will be, and will deserve to be.

For Uncle Sam, the best advice ever thought up is still, "Mind your own business"—by staying home and cultivating democracy in a land which cannot be successfully attacked as long as its people do mind their own business.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, at this point I yield to my friend and colleague the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], after which I shall resume.

COMPARISON OF ELECTRIC RATES BETWEEN MUNICIPALLY OWNED AND PRIVATELY OWNED PLANTS

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to make only a very short statement.

I hold in my hand a comparison of electric-light rates made by the Burns & McDonnell Engineering Co., of Kansas City, Mo. The heading is:

SHOULD ELECTRIC-LIGHT RATES BE INVESTIGATED?

This is a comparison of consumers' electric-light rates as between municipally owned plants and privately owned plants. The comparison deals first with cities of 50,000 population and over; and the comparison is made on consumptions of 25 kilowatt-hours, 40 kilowatt-hours, 100 kilowatt-hours, and 250 kilowatt-hours. In every case the computation shows that the rate paid by the domestic consumer of electricity who gets his current from a municipally owned plant is a much lower rate than that paid by the consumer who gets his electric current from a privately owned plant.

For instance, in cities having a population of 50,000 or more, if the domestic consumer consumes 25 kilowatt-hours, and gets his electricity from a privately owned plant, he pays on an average $1.44 for the service. If the plant is municipally owned, he pays $1.07 for the same service.

If he consumes 40 kilowatt-hours, and the electricity is furnished by a privately owned utility, he pays $2.11 for the service. If it is municipally owned, he pays $1.61 for the service.

If he consumes 100 kilowatt-hours, and buys the electricity from private parties, he pays $4.06. If he buys it from a municipally owned plant, he pays $3.14.

If he consumes 250 kilowatt-hours, and buys his electricity from a privately owned plant, he pays $7.44. If he buys it from a municipally owned plant, he pays $5.85.

Worked out in percentages, if the consumer uses 25 kilowatt-hours, the municipal plant furnishes it to him at 25.7 percent less than the privately owned plant.

If he consumes 40 kilowatt-hours, the municipal plant furnishes it to him at 23.7 percent less than the privately owned plant would furnish it.

If he consumes 100 kilowatt-hours, the municipal plant furnishes it to him at 22.7 percent less.

If he consumes 250 kilowatt-hours, the municipal plant furnishes it to him at 21.4 percent less.

So, with the comparison of populations of 25,000 to 50,000, of 15,000 to 25,000, and of 7,500 to 15,000; in every instance, without a single exception, the consumer gets his electricity from the publicly owned plant at a very material reduction from what he would have to pay if the plant furnishing the electricity were privately owned.

The first question that is usually asked, and one which probably is in the minds of Senators who are listening to me, is, "What about taxes?" That is a fair question, an honest question. It is the first one always asked. It is said, "The municipal plant does not pay taxes." Let us see what this comparison shows. It shows that while the municipal plant cannot pay taxes as such, it pays a certain amount in lieu of taxes in service—for instance, by supplying street lights free or at a very much reduced rate, or by paving streets, or by building a city hall, or something of the kind—so that in every single instance over the United States the municipal plant on the average pays more taxes than are paid by the privately owned plant.

For instance, this statement, while not containing a division by population, compares taxes paid with money paid in lieu of taxes by municipal plants of the entire United States, covering all domestic utility rates everywhere, in every city, in every hamlet; and it shows that the private utility plants over the United States pay 14.4 percent of their income in taxes, while the public-utility properties pay 26.8 percent in lieu of taxes, making a difference in the payment of taxes in favor of the municipal plants of 12.4 percent—that much more than is paid in taxes by the privately owned utilities.

Another question will probably be in the minds of Senators as they listen to me: "Where does this information come from? Who furnishes it?" I have said that the compilation was made by the Burns & McDonnell Engineering Co., of Kansas City, Mo. They get all their figures from public sources. They get the information from the report of the Federal Power Commission which made this investigation under a resolution passed by the Senate. From that report the compilation was made. It could have been made by a Senator or anyone else, although it would take considerable time.

Mr. President, I ask that the comparison furnished by Burns & McDonnell Engineering Co. be printed in the RECORD at this point of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL JUDGES

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I asked the Senator from North Carolina to yield at this time because it is necessary for me to leave the city this evening. It had been my hope that during the course of the day, as was originally anticipated, House bill 7079 might come before the Senate for consideration. It is a bill providing for certain additional district and circuit judges in the United States courts.

Mr. President, at this time I send forward an amendment which I intend to propose to that bill when it comes before the Senate for consideration, and since it is necessary, because of imperative matters, for me to leave the city this afternoon, and possibly I will not be able to return for a day or two, I wish to make a very brief statement in connection with the amendment. I ask that the amendment be printed and to lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, the bill as it is reported from the Senate committee, as a substitute for the House bill, provides for one additional circuit judge in the eighth judicial circuit. I am thoroughly familiar with the reason why only one additional judge was provided for in the eighth circuit, instead of two, as was recommended by the Judicial Council of the United States. The reason is that an investigation was made somewhat over a year and a half ago by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, of the various increases recommended by the Judicial Council. A subcommittee of one Senator, one of the most competent members of this body, I may say, was sent to the eighth circuit for the purpose of making the investigation. He reported that one additional judge was imperatively necessary in that circuit. He said that two could be very easily justified, but that it was possible that the circuit might be able to transact its business with one additional judge, and the committee, out of an excess of caution, in the recommendation of additional judges recommended only one additional judge.

Mr. President, the position of the Senator who investigated the matter of the eighth circuit was entirely justified at that time, because at the time of his investigation the eighth circuit had three retired circuit judges, who had never retired from the active performance of their duty. Although technically retired circuit judges, they performed as arduous and as efficient duties as they had when they were active judges. The three were Judge Faris, of Missouri, Judge Van Valkenburgh, of Missouri, and Judge Booth, of Minnesota.

Since the time of that investigation Judge Faris has died, Judge Booth has become totally incapacitated, and Judge Van Valkenburgh has become less able to perform the service which he had performed before his retirement.

Therefore the situation has completely changed, and I think that any investigation will disclose the fact that two judges in that circuit are imperatively needed now, as was recommended by the Judicial Council 2 years ago.

Mr. President, at this point I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a letter written to me, in response to an inquiry I made, by the Honorable Kimbrough Stone, presiding judge of the eighth circuit, together with a statement of information which he attached to his letter to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter and statement are as follows:

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT,
Kansas City, Mo., March 19, 1940.

Hon. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I noticed in the Kansas City Journal of last night that the Senate Judiciary Committee had reported out a bill for additional judges which apparently includes but one circuit judge for this eighth circuit. Last week the House passed a similar bill, except that it was amended to include two circuit judges for this circuit.

The need for two circuit judges in this circuit is very real and pressing. As you know, we got along for several years because we had three retired judges. Judge Faris has died, Judge Booth is totally incapacitated, and Judge Van Valkenburgh is slowing up decidedly. This loss of help from our retired judges has resulted in a liberal use of district judges on the court of appeals during the past year.

There is quite a sentiment in the bar that district judges should not be used on the appellate court but that appeal cases should be heard by appellate judges only. Irrespective of this view of the bar, all of the district judges in this circuit have so much work to do that it is not right to put upon them this extra burden.

Of course, one additional judge would help, but it would not meet the situation fully by any means. The only remedy is for two additional circuit judges.

I earnestly hope that you can take the time to contact the Senators in the seven States of this circuit and see that the court gets this needed help. I am sure that not only the circuit and district judges in the circuit will be grateful but also the litigants who have cases in any of those courts.

I am enclosing herewith a statement of some of the reasons why this help is needed and hope you can give it consideration.

With kind personal regards and best wishes,

Sincerely your friend,

KIMBROUGH STONE.

STATEMENT BY JUDGE KIMBROUGH STONE, SENIOR CIRCUIT JUDGE, EIGHTH CIRCUIT

The necessity for two additional circuit judges in the eighth circuit arises from three coacting influences which are (I) increase of work, (II) decrease in number of judges to do the increased work, and (III) method of doing work.

(I) INCREASE OF WORK

The increase of work is caused both (a) by increase in number of cases and (b) by increased difficulty in character of cases.

Effects of number of cases and of character of cases on judicial work

While the number of cases in a court has a direct bearing upon the work of the court, because each case must be separately examined and determined, yet the character of the cases is even more important. The difference between the effect of the number of cases and the effect of the character of cases arises from the time and the effort required to examine a particular case. If a case presents issues on points of law frequently before the court and has a comparatively small record, it will not require great and extended effort and time to read the record and to decide the issues. If a case presents new, unusual, or difficult law issues or has a long record, it requires, naturally, more effort and time to determine it. Where a case presents both new, unusual, or difficult law issues and also has a long record, the effort and time are, of course, still greater. Therefore, one difficult case or one having a long record, or one having both difficult issues and a long record, may require more effort and time than a dozen of the relatively lighter kind.

Let me illustrate the relative importance of number and of character of cases. All experienced appellate Federal judges know that it is the rare criminal case which requires much effort or time. This is so because the same kind of issues are presented in criminal appeals again and again (therefore the applicable law is familiar and fresh in the judges' minds) and the records are very rarely long. On the other hand, many civil cases present novel issues of law and many have long records.

Next, let us apply the above considerations of number and character of cases to the actual situation in this circuit.

(A) Increase in Number of Cases

The increase in number of cases for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, was about 8 percent above the average for the preceding 14 years. It was almost 14 percent above the number filed the preceding year. The increase in number of cases for the fiscal year 1939 over the year 1938 was over 7½ percent. There is every reasonable assurance that the number of cases in future years will increase—certainly there is no hope for a sustained decrease.

(B) Increase in Difficulty of Cases

The character of civil cases coming before a Federal court of appeals depends upon many factors. One of these factors is the kind of social conditions and businesses in the particular circuit. For example, the second circuit (except for Vermont, being the seaboard States of New York and Connecticut) will have a considerable number of admiralty cases which can be rather easily disposed of because the law is settled and the records not exceedingly long. On the other hand, the eighth circuit is located in the middle of the country with both large rural areas and also with large cities therein. This results in a wide diversity of kinds of civil cases coming on appeal in this circuit. This diversity is convincingly shown by the fact that in 1938 over 47 percent of the cases filed in this court were not susceptible of classification under the rather detailed table of classes (15 classes) devised by the Department of Justice—this large percentage of cases had to be placed in the catch-all class called miscellaneous. In 1939 the miscellaneous cases were almost 48 percent of the total cases—there being 17 classes.

(a) Effect of legislation: Another factor is recent legislation by Congress. Whenever Congress enacts a statute, affecting many people in their mode of life or business, the natural result is an increase in litigation. First, there come attacks upon the validity of the act. If the act is sustained by the Supreme Court, there follows an extended period of tests as to the proper construction of and as to the application of the act. In the past few years Congress has enacted a more than usual number of such statutes, which are noticeably increasing the work of the court of appeals or of the judges therein. Examples of these are the creation of various administrative boards, the Chandler Bankruptcy Act, the new rules governing trials in district courts—authorized by Congress—and the act requiring three judges, one of whom must be a circuit judge, in all district court cases attacking the validity of an act of Congress.

Administrative boards: The acts creating the various administrative boards require direct reviews or enforcement of board orders to be brought direct in the proper circuit court of appeals. The action of these new administrative agencies is in new legal fields where there is little or no precedent and, therefore, where a very considerable burden is placed upon the courts of appeals in trying to construe and apply these new laws so as to carry out the intention of Congress.

In addition to this, the records in these review proceedings are nearly always very large. Rarely are they as little as 1,000 pages—except in reviews coming from the Board of Tax Appeals. I have on my desk now one such record of more than 4,000 pages. I am informed that two such reviews have been recently filed in this court wherein the records will exceed 20,000 pages in each case.

In most of these cases, one point always urged is the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings and order of the board or commission. Such an issue can be determined only by a careful reading of the entire record.

Last year, 20 percent of the total cases filed in this court were reviews of administrative boards or commissions.

Chandler Bankruptcy Act: This new act—approved June 22, 1938, effective September 22, 1938—makes numerous changes in the bankruptcy act as theretofore existing. There can be no question but that these changes will result in much litigation extending over years until these changed provisions have received judicial interpretation.

In addition to this, the Chandler Act makes one change which is already being reflected in increasing litigation in the courts of appeals. Before the Chandler Act, appeals in bankruptcy matters were allowable by the district courts as of right only in certain described instances (secs. 24 and 25 of the act, secs. 47 and 48, U. S. C. A., title 11). In all other instances, allowance of such appeals was within the discretion of the courts of appeals and many appeals were denied. The Chandler Act gives appeals as of right except in the limited class of cases where the amount involved is $500 or less. Obviously, the number of appeals is being, and will be, increased.

New rules: The broad sweeping scope of these rules is stated (rule 1) as governing the procedure in the district courts "in all suits of a civil nature" with certain exceptions set out in rule 81. They make drastic changes in very many phases of procedure from the commencement of an action through to an appeal and also as to some phases of appellate procedure. Any experienced lawyer knows that there will be hundreds of appeals involving construction of these rules. Such result has followed the introduction of every code in a State. This effect is being felt already and will continue for many years—resulting in a definite increase of the number of appeals and of the work in the courts of appeals.

Three-judge cases: The act of August 24, 1937 (50 Stat. 752, U. S. C. A., title 28, sec. 280a) requires three judges—at least one of whom must be a circuit judge—to sit in all injunction cases involving constitutionality of acts of Congress. Cases under this act are not numerous but they are highly important and usually involve extended hearings for taking evidence. Each such case takes at least one circuit judge away from his regular appellate court duties—usually for some time—thus interfering with his disposition of appellate business.

(b) Erie Railroad Co. v. Tompkins (304 U. S. 64): This decision (April 25, 1938) has decidedly increased the work of the courts of appeals in circuits having several States—this circuit has seven States. Theretofore, many appeals involved applications of the so-called general law (defined by Mr. Justice Story in Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. 1, in 1842). In the nearly 100 years between the Swift case and the Erie case, this general law as to many recurring situations had been fairly well defined, and, therefore, was not especially difficult of statement or application. Of course, no matter in what State an appeal might arise, the rule was the same. The Erie case has reversed all of that. The general law has, at least as to substantive law, disappeared. Now, the same issue (formerly subject to general law and governed by one rule) may come up in seven cases—one from each of the seven States in this circuit—and, instead of the easy statement and application of one rule to all, we must examine the law separately as to each case so as to ascertain and apply the law of the particular State from which the case came. Thus, until the entire field formerly covered by this general law is settled, the work on this character of appeals may be multiplied seven times, because we have seven States in this circuit. It is certain that our work of this kind will be affected every year for a number of years.

(c) Generally: In outlining the above particular matters which increase the work of the court of appeals of this circuit, I have not tried to mention every such consideration, but only such as are rather outstanding. There are others. One of these only will be mentioned. While the number of appeals increases, the number of criminal appeals decreases. As said hereinbefore, criminal cases are, as a class, less difficult of examination and determination. Last year (fiscal 1939) the criminal appeals in this circuit were less than one-third of the average for the preceding 4 years. Criminal appeals have tended to fall off since the criminal appeal rules were put in force by the Supreme Court in 1934. Those rules have much discouraged criminal appeals which were frivolous or for delay. The situation is that the less meritorious—and therefore easily disposed of—criminal appeals are disappearing, while the total number of all kinds of appeals and reviews is increasing. The result is that a hundred appeals today require decidedly more time and effort than the same number did a few years ago.

The actual result is that the work of this court has materially increased in the last few years.

II. DECREASE IN JUDGES

In the past few years this court has been able to keep up with this additional work only because of the fortunate circumstance that we had additional temporary help. This help came through the valuable assistance of three experienced and able retired circuit judges. Judge Wilbur F. Booth retired on January 1, 1932; Judge Arba S. Van Valkenburgh, on May 1, 1933; Judge Charles B. Faris, on December 1, 1935.

We have now lost most of this assistance. Judge Faris died December 19, 1938. Judge Booth has not sat since September 1938, and will certainly not sit again because of defective hearing and other serious physical ailments—he will be 79 years old next August. Only Judge Van Valkenburgh remains. He does an excellent quality of work but sits only from one-third to one-half as much as a single active judge. How much longer he will want to help is problematical, as he will be 78 years old next August and is not in the best of physical health.

III. METHOD OF DOING WORK

(a) Choice of method: Wherever a court is made up of more than one judge and where more than one must sit in every case, there is a choice of method which affects both the rights of the litigants and speed of the work and, therefore, the number of cases which can be disposed of within any given period of time. This choice is between doing the work properly or doing it quickly.

The same judges can turn out much more work if they want to sacrifice good, thorough work to speed. Some courts do just this thing. For example, there are courts of three or more judges where, at the adjournment of court for the day, the judges talk over for an hour or more the three to six cases heard that day. They reach a decision in each case and the cases are assigned for opinions. Each judge then writes the opinions assigned to him. By the time these opinions get to the other judges (who have been busy writing the other opinions assigned to them) these other judges have more or less hazy remembrances of the cases they do not write. If an opinion reads well they concur without more. Such a method results, in essence, in a one-man decision. By this method more cases are disposed of but the litigants have not had their rights because they have really not had the mature, careful consideration of each of the judges who sat. Thus the substantial rights of all of the litigants have been sacrificed for the sole end of speed.

Our method of work: The act of Congress creating the circuit courts of appeals provides that each of such courts "shall consist of three judges" (U. S. C. A., title 28, sec. 212). This court has always construed this language to mean that Congress would not have required three judges unless it intended that litigants should have the careful consideration and determination of each one of the three judges and that the judgment of the court should be the result of the real work of three men.

Our entire method is designed solely to get the careful consideration of each judge and therethrough to have every judgment of this court represent the best thought which three men—not just the thought of the one judge who might write the opinion—can bring to bear. To secure this result—sought by Congress—we have evolved the following method:

Our unit of work is our week during which the same three judges usually sit. (1) At the end of each day there is an informal discussion of the cases heard that day. This discussion has two purposes: First, to ascertain if the decision in any case is so clear that it needs no further consideration (this rarely occurs); and, second, to fix the oral argument in our minds. (2) Next, each judge independently investigates each case—reading the record and briefs—and prepares his written memorandum thereon. (3) When all three judges have prepared such memorandum, a conference is held. At this conference memoranda are read and there is a full discussion as to how each case shall be decided and as to the grounds for each decision. (4) The cases are then for the first time assigned for opinions—usually such assignments are made to the judge who seems to have the best and clearest grasp of a particular case (as shown by his memorandum and discussion during conference).

The above method absolutely secures the independent thought and investigation of each judge. These memoranda are usually quite complete, and frequently are extended discussions of every point in the case necessary to be decided. I have one now on my desk of 24 typewritten pages of legal-cap paper. Thus, when the three judges gather for conference, each is thoroughly informed and prepared on each case and, therefore, can discuss it intelligently. The result is that every decision is the product of three minds which have investigated separately and thereafter discussed together every point presented by counsel. Through years of experience, this is the best method we have been able to develop to put into the decision the informed judgment of every judge who sat—a result intended by Congress and, therefore, one to which the litigants are entitled.

Clearly this method involves an enormous amount of work. We could reduce our work by two-thirds if only the one judge who wrote the opinion made this thorough investigation. Also, opinions could be gotten out faster and more cases disposed of if we did not do the work this way. But such gain in dispatch of business would be at the sacrifice of good work. When Congress required three judges, it did not intend that two of them should be mere "yes" men and figureheads.

We have regarded it as our first and great duty to be as near right as possible. This is the basis of our method.

IV. NEED FOR TWO ADDITIONAL JUDGES

The net result of all the above is that the court of appeals of this circuit has for the past few years had more work than the five active judges alone could possibly have done; that this work has been kept up to date only because of the help of the three retired circuit judges and, later, by use of district judges. The help from retired circuit judges has now, in large part, finally ceased. Either the docket must fall behind, district judges must be used, or the court must have additional circuit judges to help do the work. The necessary man power can come only from one of two sources—by use of district judges on the court or by additional circuit judges.

Use of district judges: There has been substantial objection by the bar to having the determination of appeals participated in by trial judges. This is not the place to discuss the advantages or disadvantages of such practice, but I merely call attention to this attitude of the bar as an existing fact.

A more important thing is the practical situation in the circuit. That situation is that the district judges in this circuit have all they can do to look after the work in their own district courts, and some of them are overburdened. To place upon them the further work of service on the court of appeals is obviously unfair to them and to the litigants in their courts. While it may be better to have some districts fall behind rather than to have the court of appeals fall behind, yet this is but a choice between two evils, neither of which should be permitted and both of which can be avoided by the simple expedient of increasing the man power of the court of appeals itself.

I have been a member of this court of appeals for more than 23 years and the senior judge for almost half of that time. During that period I think I have gained experience which is useful in estimating the situation of the appeal litigation in the circuit and in gaging the man force necessary to take proper care of that litigation. All of the present judges work hard and intelligently. They cannot do more than they are doing. I am certain that the court needs these two additional judges. I hope the Congress will see its way to provide them during this session, so that the work will not fall behind or the district courts be badly affected—either result is bound to affect litigants harmfully.

I will be happy to aid in any way in further understanding our problems.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I may say in this connection that, in view of these facts, the House of Representatives has already provided in the bill for two additional judges, and I may say that I have been privately informed by the Senators who in all likelihood will be the conferees on the part of the Senate that the Senate will accede to that in conference.

Mr. President, it seems to me desirable from every standpoint that there be no disagreement between the two Houses upon this very simple essential proposition; and if I am not present at the time the bill comes before the Senate for consideration, the amendment will be offered on my behalf by another Senator, and I hope it may receive favorable consideration by the Senate.

I thank the Senator from North Carolina very much for his courtesy in yielding to me at this point.

LIMITATION OF IMMIGRATION OF ALIENS FROM MEXICO

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I wish to say that I am very happy to have had the opportunity to yield to the distinguished Senator from Missouri, in particular view of the fact that we have at this time been discussing propaganda from all sources, and I wish to state that I hope that the Senate will pass favorably upon the Senator's resolution, which calls for an appropriation of $25,000 for investigating propaganda in this country, because now of all times we should make an investigation of those forces that may aid in sucking us into the present unfortunate situation in Europe.

Mr. President, during the last session of Congress there was much discussion concerning the condition of affairs in Mexico. Everyone knows that the Government of Mexico, having adopted the doctrines of Moscow, has been stealing property from American citizens on a grand scale, secure in the belief that the Government of the United States would do nothing about it. Trouble is brewing. Thousands of Spanish anarchists and communists have already entered Mexico. Many of these, I am advised, are leaving Mexico for the United States, entering this country as Mexican citizens.

Our Government has favored Mexico in too many ways. A time of reckoning is at hand. By acts and conduct, Mexico is essentially a colony of Soviet Russia.

Our nationals working and owning property in Mexico have been driven out. They have had their farms and means of livelihood taken from them. In many cases they have been returned to the United States penniless and destitute.

Compared to this, it is reported there are residing in the United States approximately 1,000,000 Mexicans. Many of these have conveniently become American citizens to be eligible for relief. Others displace American labor and thereby add to our unemployment rolls.

The unemployment question alone is not so important as the fact that subversive political doctrines adopted by Mexico are dangerous to the peace and welfare of our Nation. To avoid danger to our own country and its institutions, and to protect American interests in Mexico, some consideration of this problem must be given by Congress. With 1,000,000 Mexicans in the United States, presumably loyal to the Mexican Government and in accord with its communistic policies, danger impends to the welfare of our Nation. Its peace and safety may be disturbed. I am, therefore, introducing a resolution dealing with the subject. It limits the number of Mexican aliens residing or engaged in occupations, business, or work in the United States to an equivalent number of Americans residing or engaged in similar activities in Mexico.

I send the resolution to the desk and ask that it be referred to the proper committee, but I desire to read the last paragraph thereof:

Resolved, etc., That all Mexican aliens residing in or engaged in occupations, business, or work of any character in the United States shall hereafter be limited to an equivalent number of citizens of the United States gainfully engaged in Mexico; and all Mexican citizens who have within the last 12 months signified their intention of becoming naturalized American citizens shall be accepted by the United States unless they are or are likely to become public burdens in any manner; and all Mexican aliens in excess of Americans in Mexico as provided herein shall be deported within 1 year after the date of the enactment of this resolution.

(The joint resolution introduced by Mr. REYNOLDS (S. J. Res. 242), which was referred to the Committee on Immigration, appears under the appropriate heading "Bills and joint resolutions introduced.")

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, in pursuance of my statement in regard to our relations with Mexico, I dare say Mexico has no better friend upon the entire face of the earth than the United States. To the south of us, lying across the muddy waters of the Rio Grande, there is a vast area populated by 15,000,000 people, who have been aided in many ways by the people of the United States. For instance, annually we are buying from Mexico more silver than we are buying from any other country in the world. As a matter of fact, despite the great development of the silver mines which men have dug in the bowels of the earth in the silver-mining areas of Peru, we continue to be the best purchaser of silver Mexico has ever had.

In addition to that, during the past year more than 300,000 American tourists took millions upon millions of American dollars into the Republic of Mexico, by way of that great and finely engineered highway leading from Laredo, on the border of Texas, to beautiful Mexico City, the capital of Mexico, 700 miles southward, which lies more than 7,200 feet above sea level.

I think there are in this country too many Mexicans. They are coming here to take, and they are taking jobs which rightly belong to American citizens. I like the Mexican people immensely. Once upon a time I had the honor conferred upon me of being invited to address the Mexican Senate, which invitation I accepted; but, at the same time, I do not They have confiscated about $450,000,000 worth of our oil properties, and, in addition to that, they have confiscated thousands upon thousands of acres of fertile land which had been bought and was being tilled through American dollars.

When we speak of those tremendous haciendas, when we speak of the oil investments there, we are not actually referring to great and powerful corporations, but we are speaking of the American people, because innumerable widows and orphans have their funds invested in the stocks of companies that were organized for the purpose of buying those lands, and companies, such as some of the large oil companies, for the purpose of developing the resources which are found south of the Rio Grande. I like the Mexicans very much. They are very hospitable and kindly people, and Mexico is the most colorful country lying to the south of us, perhaps, with the exception of Guatemala.

Speaking of Mexican labor coming into this country daily, weekly, monthly, and yearly to take the jobs of American citizens, I am very happy to be able to see to the left of me my friend from the great Rocky Mountain area, the distinguished junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], who was the chief executive of that State for a number of years. In pursuing this subject I recall to mind the fact that several years ago, when he was Governor of the State of Colorado, thousands upon thousands of Mexicans came from the Republic to the south into his State and pushed out of employment thousands upon thousands of Americans who were there engaged in gathering beets for the sugar-beet industry of the State. So thoroughly interested was the junior Senator from Colorado in the people of his own State having the jobs which rightly belonged to them, that he said:

No; I am interested only in the people of Colorado; I am interested in seeing to it that my constituents in this State get the jobs first; and if there are any left over, I want the people of the adjoining States to have them; and then, if there are any left over, the Mexicans can come in and take them.

But the chief executive at that time, Governor JOHNSON, did not by that statement halt the Mexicans. So what did he do? He called out the National Guard and placed them at the border, and he told the Mexicans they could not come in, and they did not come in. The result was that, instead of the unfortunate labor in his State being ground down, Governor JOHNSON found work for his people, and he turned the faces of the Mexicans southward to their own land.

Let us see about this. Here is another article:

SPANIARDS IN MEXICO PUSH "RED" ACTIVITIES—GOVERNMENT IS UNDISTURBED—HASTENS THEIR CITIZENSHIP

MEXICO CITY, February 5.—Various Rightist and anti-Communist organizations have been protesting from time to time against the activities of Spanish émigrés here. Two principal complaints are made against them.

Thousands of the Loyalists from Spain are making their way over the seas to Mexico with a view to eventually entering the United States and joining in activities with the Communists in this country in an endeavor to overthrow our Government. And the Communists are exceedingly bold. I notice that they are defying unhesitatingly Mr. MARTIN DIES, of that great all-American committee which has done so much for our country for some time past and has brought out from under cover those who have been doing the devilment in this country for the past several years. The article continues:

The first is that they are actively spreading Communist ideas, in defiance of article XXXIII of the Mexican Constitution, which lays down the rule that no foreigner may meddle in domestic politics. The second is that those of them who have military experience are being trained to act as officers of the "workers' army" in the event that internal trouble should break out.

These protests, however, are usually directed against specified individuals and not against the Spanish refugees as a whole. The Mexican Government does not appear to be in any way disturbed by the Communist activities of a part of these Spanish refugees or to anticipate any difficulties in this respect.

So far the Government has refused to take any measures. Indeed, the Diario Official on January 23 published a decree declaring that all Spanish residents of Mexico were immediately eligible for Mexican citizenship. This means that an easy way has been afforded to the Spaniards to carry on in perfect legality the Communist activities that they hitherto carried on in violation of the constitution.

This decree, incidentally, raises an interesting question in connection with American immigration restrictions. It is evident that any Spaniard can now enter the United States by the simple expedient of coming to Mexico, acquiring Mexican citizenship, and crossing the frontier into the United States on a Mexican passport. The American immigration quota has, therefore, virtually ceased to exist where Spaniards are concerned.

As a matter of fact, there is no immigration quota existing between the United States and Mexico, or any of the Central and South American countries. The article concludes:

It is worthy of note that the number of Spanish émigrés in Mexico is not great and that only a very small part of them is engaged in political activities. The last time an official count was made—early in September of last year—the total number was given as 5,787. Some hundreds have arrived since then, but the total now probably does not exceed 6,500.

Mr. President, in further pursuance of this subject, I desire to read from another article which appeared in the New York Times, as follows:

FIFTEEN HUNDRED SPANIARDS SEEK MEXICAN CITIZENSHIP—CHANCE FOR THEM THEN TO ENTER UNITED STATES IS NOTED

MEXICO CITY, April 5.—Applications for Mexican naturalization have been made for 400 families of Spanish refugees, comprising about 1,500 persons, or almost a quarter of the total of Spanish Republican émigrés in this country. It is expected that most of them will be granted soon.

The émigrés are eligible for citizenship, provided they can prove they were born in Spain and have now taken up residence in Mexico. Naturalization is then granted without further formalities at the discretion of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Fears have been expressed in the senate here that this simplified procedure for granting citizenship to Spaniards might result in Washington's withdrawing the privilege Mexicans now have of entering the United States without being subjected to the immigration quotas that apply to citizens of all nations except those of the American continents.

The Mexican naturalization law, in fact, is regarded in some quarters as having the effect of canceling the United States immigration quota on Spain, since any Spaniard apparently might come to Mexico, acquire Mexican citizenship almost immediately, and then enter the United States on a Mexican passport.

A group of senators is debating the advisability of demanding an extraordinary session of congress to reconsider the naturalization law, which became operative only 3 weeks ago.

Mr. President, I have here another article, entitled "Ten thousand Spanish refugees already in the country."

This dispatch is from Veracruz. By the way, I might add that, according to my information, the greatest number of Spanish Loyalist refugees, many of whom are Communists, or they would now be in Spain, are entering through the port of Veracruz, and from Veracruz, of course, they go up by railway to Mexico City, and spread out to other sections of the country. I understand that a number are now at Acapulco, on the West Coast, and many are at Tampico, where it is said they are causing much trouble.

This article is dated Veracruz, July 9:

TEN THOUSAND SPANISH REFUGEES ALREADY IN THE COUNTRY

VERACRUZ, July 9.—The total number of Spanish refugees already in Mexico amounts to 10,000, for to the 944 who arrived yesterday on the steamship Ipamena, and the 1,000 who came before on the steamship Sinai, there must be added those who have come into Mexico through the northern frontier. Two thousand more are expected on the 21st of this month on the steamship Mexique, and it is estimated that in the course of 2 months, within which term the immigration must be completed, the total number of refugees will be 40,000.

The above information was obtained by the special correspondent of Excelsior from officials of the Department of the Interior who are now in Veracruz.

Excelsior is a daily newspaper published in the city of Mexico; and the investigation and estimation of 40,000 were made by one of the members of the Department of the Interior.

It is to be noted that from the total of 10,000 refugees already in our country there should be deducted a large number who are not leftists, and who formerly lived here but left the country to join the forces of Gen. Francisco Franco.

The majority of the 944 refugees who have just arrived are technicians and industrial workers, and only 400 of them will engage in agricultural activities.

None of these refugees will be taken to Mexico City, since it has been decided to send them to the States of Aguascalientes, Coahuila, Colima, Morelos, Nuevo Leon, San Luis Potosi, Sinaloa, and Tamaulipas.

Representatives of the various State governments are now in Veracruz awaiting final distribution by the officials of the Department of the Interior.

I assume that if the 400 agriculturists are allowed to enter, it will be to till the soil which was stolen from American nationals who had invested their money down there.

I have before me a clipping entitled "Refugees." This is a letter to the public-forum column. The writer says:

SIR: Los Angeles County alone in a 2-year period spent $2,358,088.21 in hospitalization of Mexicans. Our Nation, holding the world's unemployment record, cannot afford to admit more immigrants—Mexicans from the south, Japanese from the Orient, or Europeans—despite sob-stuff propaganda about refugee children.

E. E. G.

That man, like myself, does not want a single alien from any part of the world to come to the United States until every employable unemployed worker in the United States has been provided an opportunity to earn a living.

The next article to which I refer I cut out some days ago and saved for the proper opportunity. It is entitled "DIES Checks 'Red,' Nazi Bases Beow Border. DEMPSEY To Report on Alien Agents Using Mexico."

WASHINGTON, February 28.—Representative JOHN J. DEMPSEY (Democrat), of New Mexico, directed by the Dies Un-American Activities Committee to investigate reports that Communists and Nazi agents are using Mexico as a base of operations, plans a special trip to the border within 10 days.

I shall be very happy indeed when the subcommittee of that committee makes an investigation of affairs down there, because I am told, in letters written to me and by individuals who advise me in person, that hundreds of Mexicans are coming across the border daily in violation of our law. If a Nazi base exists there, we ought to knock it out. If a Communist base is operating there, to the detriment of the American people and the American Government, that fact should be known; and if it can be ascertained, I am sure the excellent members of the committee can do so without much difficulty.

DEMPSEY was constituted a subcommittee of one to make the investigation.

I recall that because I spoke to Mr. DEMPSEY day before yesterday when I made inquiry as to when he was going there.

DEMPSEY was constituted a subcommittee of one to make the investigation. Preliminary investigation already had been conducted by George Hurley of the Dies committee staff.

Decision of the committee to embark on a thorough inquiry of the Mexican situation followed repeated reports to Chairman DIES (Democrat), of Texas, of the committee that both Communist and Nazi agents are extremely active in Mexico.

EVADE ALIEN LAW

These reports, DIES disclosed, not only indicate that the totalitarian agents are seeking control of Mexico—

It is my recollection that much of the oil was sold to the Nazis—

but make it a base of operations to carry on espionage and propaganda in the United States, thus evading the alien propaganda registration law.

The committee not only rejected proposals designed to curb DIES, but approved his proposal for a sweeping investigation of the Pacific coast, including the Hollywood movie colony, and consumers' organizations.

Mr. President, in conclusion so far as the resolution is concerned, I have before me a clipping from a Washington newspaper, the Times-Herald, entitled "Speaking Mexico's Language," in which I note that one of our colleagues in the House, Hon. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr., of Missouri, is about to take some action to bring about justice for the American investor and the American people. I ask that this article be printed in the RECORD at this juncture.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEAKING MEXICO'S LANGUAGE

If there are any Mexicans left who can understand that their country's success depends on decent, peaceful relations with the United States, they had better read and take seriously House Resolutions 454 and 455, introduced Wednesday by Representative THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr., of St. Louis, Mo.

These provide for a congressional investigation to determine whether it is true, as charged, that Mexico has been violating international law and denying justice to American citizens by seizing American property, and if these charges are true (the resolution reads):

"The Congress may take any and all means available under the Constitution to the end that commensurate justice be obtained."

Mr. HENNINGS' idea of commensurate justice, the Mexicans may be interested to know, is to exercise the powers granted Congress in article I, section 8, of the Constitution, specified as follows:

"Congress shall have the power to * * * declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water."

He is very frankly working to convince Congress that the only way the people of the United States will ever get justice in their claims for damages in Mexico is by congressional letters of marque and reprisal.

WE HAVE BEEN THE GOAT SINCE 1905

Intelligent Mexicans ought to be grateful to learn that the number of Senators and Representatives who are about done listening to the President and the State Department on how to deal with Mexico is rapidly growing. They are eager to take their exclusive direct action.

It is not mere impatience with the run-around we have been getting on both silver and oil that has them aroused. It is resentment at the abuse we have been taking ever since the Mexicans went crazy in 1905 and began to seize foreigners' property right and left. They haven't stopped since, but have only got worse.

Now this Hennings resolution could be just the thing to tip Congress into independent action. And don't think that the phrase "letters of marque and reprisal" is a mere quaint relic of 1776 power politics. As late as 1895, the British exercised the right of reprisal to collect claims against Nicaragua; the Dutch smacked Venezuela the same way in 1908; and we did it to Mexico ourselves in 1914, when the marines landed at Veracruz. The Villa expedition of 1916 was also a form of reprisal.

These are touchy times in the world and Congress is in a black mood with Mexico anyhow. It wouldn't take much to get this Hennings investigation going on. And if it ever does, reprisal in some form is certain.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, in connection with Mexican immigration, I have a bill to limit immigration into the United States and to establish a quota system covering all countries and areas located in North, Central, and South America, and the islands adjacent thereto, and for other purposes. It will be recalled that we have no quota system for Mexico, Central America, South America, or the West Indies. That fact is important in view of the fact that residing south of us, in the countries of Central and South America and the West Indies, is a population equal to that of the United States of America, which I believe our census this year will show, is about 135,000,000 to 140,000,000 people The bill has to do with restricting immigration, and I have prepared remarks in particular reference to the bill.

Mr. President, Members of the Senate are thoroughly aware that I believe that the most satisfactory way to deal with the alien problem in the United States is definitely and positively to suspend all entries into our country for a term of years, but as an alternative to that proposal, if the Senate will not agree to suspend all immigration for a period of 10 years, I offer a bill which in simple terms establishes a quota system for the Western Hemisphere. It establishes this system with due regard to the good-neighbor policy, of which our President is an ardent advocate, and in which I gladly and happily join our President, because I have always been very much impressed with the friendliness of the people of all the countries to the south of us.

Let me digress at this point to say that I am very happy indeed to note that in some of the countries to the south of us our trade within the past year has increased 33 percent, and in some instances as much as 52 percent. I hope the State Department and our Commerce Department may succeed in continuing that increase in trade with our neighbors to the south.

The bill takes as a basis the average entries of immigrants admitted from countries of the Western Hemisphere and islands adjacent thereto for the 4 fiscal years 1936 to 1939, during which the good-neighbor policy has been in effect. For this reason it cannot in any way be construed as discriminating against our friends to the north of us or to the south of the Rio Grande; but, at the same time, my quota proposal establishes a very definite safeguard against an influx of alien refugees who are making Mexico, the West Indies, Central and South America a mere stepping-stone to cover their entry into the United States by naturalization in those countries against which we now have no quota limitations.

(At this point Mr. REYNOLDS introduced Senate bill 3730, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration, and appears under the appropriate heading, "Bills and Joint Resolutions Introduced.")

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am perfectly aware that our existing statutes have written into them a safeguard that only persons born in the Western Hemisphere are eligible for entry as nonquota immigrants, but I need hardly say that the enforcement of the existing law is not of such a character as to give any assurance that the place-of-birth provision will be adequate to protect us. As a matter of fact, there are often very grave difficulties in establishing the birthplace of an alien seeking to enter our shores.

I think my esteemed colleague, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], will assure the Senate that I am in no way exaggerating by saying that aliens in transit through Canada have succeeded in entering the United States by obtaining duplicate birth certificates of Canadian citizens by the simple practice of paying a small fee for a copy. The danger of the situation is well exemplified by the facts set forth in a letter from a high official of one of the countries to the south of us. I refer to Haiti, the capital of which is Port-au-Prince, and which has as its territory a part of the island on which the Dominican Republic is located.

Mr. President, I should like to read that letter at this time. I do not read French——

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator hope to conclude his remarks this afternoon?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes; I am about to conclude.

I sent this letter to the Library of Congress and asked that it be translated. I send to the desk the letter from the Haitian Government and its translation, and also the translation from the State Department, of the letter in regard to the purchase of citizenships in Haiti; and I may add that I had a very prompt and very courteous reply from the Secretary of State of the Haitian Government in reference to the sale of citizenships.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter and translations be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matters referred to are as follows:

REPUBLIQUE D'HAITI,
SECRETAIRERIE D'ETAT DES RELATIONS EXTERIEURES,
Port-au-Prince, 17 Janvier, 1940.

Monsieur ROBERT R. REYNOLD:,
Sénator des Etats-Unis d'Amérique,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MONSIEUR: J'ai reçu votre lettre du 6 janvier en cours me priant de vous dire si les conditions indiquées par M. Edouard Horelle dans une lettre dont copie en ma possession sont exactes relativement à l'acquisition de la nationalité haitienne.

Il y a lieu de noter, à cet égard, que désireux de soulager sans trop nuire aux intérêts nationaux, le malheureux sort fait aux israélites ou autres refugiés, mon Gouvernement avait décidé de leur permettre d'obtenir la nationalité haitienne en s'adressant à un agent haitien à l'étranger. Mais de tels abus sont survenus dans l'exécution de cette décision que le Gouvernement a décidé de rapporter le décret-loi du 29 mai 1939 qui régissait la matière.

Veuillez agréer, Monsieur, les assurances de ma considération distinguée.

[Translation of the foregoing letter]

SIR: I have received your letter of January 6, in which you ask whether the conditions indicated by M. Edouard Horelle, in a letter of which I have a copy, are correct relative to the acquisition of Haitian nationality.

It is to be noted on this point that my Government, being anxious to alleviate without too much injustice to the national interest the unhappy lot of the Jews and other refugees, had decided to permit them to acquire Haitian nationality upon application to a Haitian agent abroad. But so many abuses were discovered in the execution of this decision that the Government has decided to cancel the decree law of May 29, 1939, which regulated the matter.

Respectfully,

The Haitian Government, having decided to increase the number of social organization of publics utility, has voted a new law on naturalization. Any foreigner not living in Haiti at the present time can become Haitian citizen in making a special vow at a Haitian consulate and the new Haitian citizen will come to Haiti at any moment. The foreigner after the vow will have the Haitian nationality—Haiti will be great open for same.

In order to give to the foreigner willing to become Haitian citizen the necessary authorization of making, at any Haitian consulate, the Government vow requested by the law, the Haitian Government will take as contribution to the social government organizations of publics utility from any foreigner a gift of $1,500 for single person and $2,000 for a married couple, and the wife then become also Haitian citizen, and for the children of 18 years the gift shall be of $1,000 each.

Each individual beside the gift shall pay to the Government a register tax of $300 per individual.

Any organization that my proposition say to look for foreigner willing to become legally Haitian citizen will be free to ask to the individual for any amount within commercial limits which they will think necessary to cover expenses and fees.

The cable expenses, my special expenses, and fees for the complete success of this transaction will be $500 per each individual.

I beg you again to excuse the liberty taking by me, say to write you regarding this special business; but not having a real good adviser in United States of America, I believe you will be kind enough to help me.

Always at your entire disposal in Haiti, and hoping to hear from you soon, I beg to remain,

Yours very truly,

(Signed) EDOUARD HORELLE,
General Secretary of the Government of Haiti Post Office Department. Ex-Chief of Immigration Department of Haiti.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I am about to conclude. I may say that in the particular country from which this letter emanated I am advised that the situation has been cured, at least temporarily, because I wrote to the Secretary of State of that country and received a most courteous response advising me that such grave abuses had arisen under the provisions of the law referred to in the letter I have just had printed in the RECORD that the law had been repealed.

I am casting no aspersions on any country in our Western Hemisphere, because I recognize the fact that in our own country we are none too careful about the way in which persons circulate under false names and obtain official documents certifying to their identity under the false names they are utilizing. In this connection I recall to your minds the fact that Earl Browder was recently convicted as a result of his ability to obtain from our State Department a passport under a false name.

In the light of these facts it is only reasonable that the Congress of the United States should respond to a widespread desire, which has been growing over a period of many years, that the great gap in our immigration laws be closed and that we establish at least quotas which will prevent the entry of any flood of immigrants which may arise as a result of the extraordinary conditions now existing throughout the world.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, APRIL 8, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our most merciful Father, in a world which is exhausting itself in stupidity and passion, we pray for the Lordship of the Man of Galilee. In this bleak period of humanity may He stand among us in His moral and spiritual leadership, with a glowing warmth of enthusiastic faith in man and his destiny. Dear Lord, as energies are limited and needs appalling, in Thy risen power grant us the guidance of Thy truth and wisdom. With true conscience and deepening understanding, and enriched with the finest privileges, help us to labor for those cleansing and redeeming relationships. Hold us in fellowship with the life spiritual that we may never allow ourselves to make dreary selfishness the prison of our souls. Inspire us with an expanding, world-wide vision that unites all men in the tasks of education, social reform, and religion; help us in those aims which are worth serving and which will win response in the heart of this vindictive world. In these days of his absence, bless and abide with our beloved Speaker. In the Redeemer's name. Heavenly Father, again we are reminded that in the midst of life we are in death. In the valley may we fear no evil. Give Thy comforting presence to the loved one who is to follow on. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, April 4, 1940, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on April 6, 1940, the President approved and signed a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 8641. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, to provide supplemental appropriations for such fiscal year, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 407. Joint resolution to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 1372. An act for the relief of W B. Tucker, Helen W. Tucker, Lonie Meadows, and Susie Meadows; and

S. 1790. An act for the relief of the Eberhart Steel Products Co., Inc.

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, an attack is being made upon the Federal Communications Commission on the ground that the Commission is retarding the development of television. The investigation I have made discloses the fact that the reason for the attack is that the Commission will not permit the Broadcasters' Trust to exploit the public through the sale of near-obsolete television sets. What we probably need more than anything else is an investigation of the Broadcasters' Trust. It is time they were stopped from monopolizing the air.

PERMISSION TO FILE MINORITY VIEWS

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK] and myself may have until midnight Thursday to file minority views to the Smith committee report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from Texas, Mr. MANSFIELD, may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include therein certain rates and statistical information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

FORMULATION OF TARIFF AND FOREIGN TRADE PROGRAM AND POLICY

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today, on behalf of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee, a joint resolution calling for the creation of a special committee, representing both the Congress and the general public, to formulate and recommend to Congress a permanent tariff and foreign trade program along certain specified lines, to be administered by an independent Government agency in compliance with clearly defined instructions from the Congress.

It is our thought that such agency should take over the tariff and foreign trade functions now exercised by the Tariff Commission and the State Department, and become the administrative agent of the Congress in carrying out the joint resolution's declared purpose of "promoting the greatest possible trade with foreign nations" while at the same time protecting domestic producers "from unfair foreign competition in the home market."

The joint resolution provides that the proposed investigating committee shall be composed of five Senators, to be selected by the President of the Senate; five Representatives, to be selected by the Speaker of the House; and five members selected by the President to represent affected interests, including agriculture, labor, industry, and consumers. The committee would be directed to report its recommendations to Congress not later than January 15, 1941, and such recommendations would be expected to conform to the broad policies laid down in the joint resolution.

The joint resolution which we offer gives effect to the suggestion made in our recent report in opposition to the extensions of the existing Trade Treaty Act, wherein we said:

> We believe that the Congress should immediately authorize an investigation of the whole question with a view to working out a combined tariff and reciprocity policy (1) that protects our vital interests, (2) that is truly flexible, and (3) that is geared to deal with foreign trade upon a realistic basis along constitutional lines.

Our proposal represents a constructive effort to set up a tariff and foreign-trade program which will accomplish these objectives and be free from the fundamental criticisms which have been raised against the tariff policy of the present administration. In our opinion, no foreign-trade program can be defended which is not reciprocal, constitutional, and beneficial to the Nation as a whole. Any program which increases importations of goods which we already produce for ourselves in abundance simply aggravates our pressing national problems of farm surpluses, industrial stagnation, and unemployment.

We believe with President William McKinley that the end in view under reciprocity should always be—

> The opening up of new markets for the products of our country by granting concessions to the products of other lands that we need and cannot produce ourselves, and which do not involve any loss of labor to our own people but tend rather to increase their employment.

Reciprocity of that kind goes hand in hand with the maintenance of reasonable tariffs on competitive foreign products as a means of assuring domestic producers at least an equal opportunity with low-cost foreign producers in selling their products in the American market. Under our proposal, improved flexible tariff procedure would be worked out for the prompt and scientific adjustment of general tariff rates.

The fact that the resolution to extend the present Trade Treaty Act passed the House by a vote of only 216 to 168 and the Senate by a vote of only 42 to 37 shows that there is widespread dissatisfaction with the foreign-trade program of the present administration. Moreover, the fact that 20 Democratic Members of the House and 15 Democratic Members of the Senate joined the Republican minority in opposition to the extension of the present program indicates that such opposition is a matter of principle and not partisanship.

The Trade Treaty Act has been extended, but the issue is not settled. There is real need for the study proposed by the joint resolution I have introduced.

In conclusion, I may say that our purpose in proposing a committee study rather than a detailed substitute program is that the matter is one of such great importance to the Nation that it should be carefully formulated after full investigation and after receiving the suggestions of all those concerned.

The text of the resolution follows:

House joint resolution providing for the creation of a Committee on Tariff and Foreign Trade Policy

Resolved, etc., That it is hereby declared to be the purpose of the Congress to establish and maintain a tariff and foreign-trade policy which, while promoting the greatest possible trade with foreign nations, will at the same time protect domestic agriculture, labor, and industry from unfair foreign competition in the home market, and be in harmony with domestic governmental policies.

SEC. 2. There is hereby created a temporary Committee on Tariff and Foreign Trade Policy (hereinafter referred to as the "Committee"), to be composed of 15 Members, as follows:

(1) Five Members of the Senate, three from the majority and two from the minority party, to be designated by the President of the Senate;

(2) Five Members of the House of Representatives, three from the majority and two from the minority party, to be designated by the Speaker; and

(3) Five members (none of whom holds any office in the Government of the United States or is engaged in the activities of any political party) to be designated by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of whom at least one shall be representative of agriculture, one of labor, one of industry, and one of consumers.

SEC. 3. (a) It shall be the duty of the Committee to carefully study all phases of the domestic and foreign trade of the United States with a view to recommending to the Congress proper legislation for carrying out the purpose declared in section 1 hereof.

(b) The Committee shall make such investigations as it may deem necessary or advisable, and shall report to the Congress from time to time, and in any event not later than January 15, 1941, the results of its investigations, together with such recommendations as it may have to make.

(c) In its study, the committee shall give special consideration to the following:

(1) The recommendation of a permanent tariff and foreign-trade policy designed to carry out the purpose declared in section 1 hereof.

(2) The creation of a nonpartisan independent government agency to give effect to such policy.

(3) The setting up of definite, intelligible, and practicable legislative standards for the prompt and scientific adjustment of tariff duties by such independent agency in accordance with such policy.

(4) The promotion, under the direction of such independent agency, of the exchange of the Nation's surpluses for the foreign products it needs but does not itself produce, by every available means (including tariff reciprocity) consistent with constitutional limitations, and with the purpose declared in section 1 hereof.

SEC. 4. (a) The committee shall meet and organize as soon as practicable after at least a majority of the members have been chosen, and shall elect a chairman and a vice chairman from among its members, and shall have power to appoint and fix the compensation of a secretary and such experts and clerical, stenographic and other assistants as it deems advisable. A vacancy on the committee shall not affect the power of the remaining members to execute the functions of the committee, and shall be filled in the same manner as the original selection.

(b) The committee is authorized to hold hearings, and to sit and act at such places and times, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services in reporting such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. Subpenas for witnesses shall be issued under the signature of the chairman or vice chairman.

(c) The committee is authorized to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of the departments and agencies in the executive branch of the Government, and of the office of the legislative counsel of the Senate and House of Representatives.

(d) The members of the committee shall serve without compensation for such services, but they shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of the duties vested in the committee.

(e) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated so much as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this joint resolution. Amounts appropriated for the expenses of the committee shall be disbursed by the Division of Disbursement, Treasury Department, upon vouchers approved by the chairman or vice chairman.

(f) All authority conferred by this joint resolution shall terminate January 15, 1941.

FEDERAL TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise to emphasize what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] said a few moments ago. He has introduced in the House today a resolution which is of tremendous importance. By way of emphasis, let me repeat that the resolution he has introduced is of tremendous importance. My reason for making this statement and emphasizing it is that his resolution provides for the appointment of a special committee to make a study and to make recommendations with reference to the tariffs levied under our laws and regulations and under the reciprocal-trade agreements that our Government has entered into with foreign nations. The tariff is, and has been, one of our most important national policies, from the very beginning of the Government. Reciprocity between our country and foreign countries, and reciprocal-trade agreements likewise have been important questions for the last 40 years. These matters have now become so confused that there is no question but that a thorough study should be made of them, so that as a Nation, and as a Congress representing the Nation, we can better determine what is best to do and how it should be done.

To be more specific, let me call your attention to the fact that just 2 or 3 weeks ago we had a very close and vigorous fight in this House over the question of whether we should extend for 3 years the present reciprocal trade agreements law. Those of you who are serving your first term no doubt were as much interested in that controversy and contest as were some of the older Members. As you know, this measure came before the House from the Ways and Means Committee.

The Democratic membership of the Ways and Means Committee had recommended the extension of the law while the Republican members had opposed it on various grounds. The report made by the majority of the committee at that time and the report made by the minority were both very lucid and comprehensive documents. I commend them to your consideration. In them you will find all the arguments for and against the extension of the law. The House voted on that measure on February 23, 1940. The vote was 216 in favor and 168 opposed. Of those 216 only 5 were Republicans, while about 20 or 25 Democrats voted with the Republicans in opposition to the extension of this law. Some of the Democrats who voted against the extension of the law are Democrats who have recognized the fact that protection of our industries through a tariff has been the greatest factor in causing our Nation to become the greatest manufacturing Nation in the world. Others who voted against the extension of this law realized its detrimental effect on the agricultural industries of the Nation. They understood and appreciated the fact that the reciprocal-trade agreements as executed by the Secretary of State were nothing more or less than agreements that would tend to carry out the free-trade ideas of the Secretary of State.

The majority of the Democrats over Republicans in the House is not nearly as large as it is in the Senate. In other words, the majority in the House is about a 2-to-1 majority, while the majority in the Senate is more than a 3-to-1 majority. The fact that the Democrats in the House failed to rally and respond to the demands of their constituents with the same enthusiasm as the Senators did would argue that a larger number of the Members of the House have failed to respond to the wishes of their constituents. There are several instances where Democratic Congressmen from a State voted with the President while the Democratic Senators from the same States voted against him, and there is an inconsistency that will call for explanation. In one case both Democratic Senators voted against the extension while the three Congressmen voted the other way.

I take this occasion to state that in my judgment the passage of this bill to extend the law giving to the Secretary of State the power to enter into these agreements will be one of the principal issues in the next campaign. The fact that the President of the United States, with the Secretary of State, who will probably succeed him as a Democratic candidate for the Presidency, were unable to force this legislation through the Senate except by the very smallest possible margin indicates conclusively that the Senate of the United States may at least not be in favor of this extension. I congratulate those Members of the House who were courageous enough to put their loyalty to constituents above their party fealty. I am sorry that many other Members of the House were unable to free themselves, but felt obligated to go ahead and support their President even though they felt that he was wrong. I want to congratulate the Senators who were able to free themselves from the domination of the President and the free-trade ideas of the Secretary of State. The President surely cannot take much consolation in this so-called victory. A change of three votes in the Senate would have defeated this bill.

Again I saw that this bill, extending the authority to execute these trade agreements for 3 more years, does not meet with the approval of the majority of the Senators and Congressmen. It should not have been passed. Public sentiment does not support it. At the next election those who failed to record the sentiment of their constituents will, I am afraid, be called to make explanation. While I feel sorry for these splendid Democratic friends of mine who have failed to properly interpret the sentiments of their constituents and may be carried out of office by reason of their unfortunate vote, still I feel that I am not in any way to blame, because I did the best I could to proclaim in the most convincing language that I could command that this bill was wrong in principle and unconstitutional and that it was destructive of the best interests of the Nation.

While the President and the Secretary of State are claiming that they have won a victory, it is not a victory on principle. It is simply another instance where Members of Congress and Members of the Senate have felt their party loyalty to be stronger than their loyalty to their constituents.

You may rest assured that this will be an issue in the next campaign and that, if a Republican administration is elected, some steps similar to these provided for in the Treadway resolution will be taken so as to take these two great important subjects out of partisan politics and place them on a higher basis, where the best interests of the country is the only consideration. [Applause.]

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, I have just introduced in the House a bill (H. R. 9273) amending the present Agricultural Adjustment Administration Act to provide for the certificate plan on wheat, cotton, rice, tobacco, and peanuts. It does not take in corn. Coming from a wheat section I realize that the time is close at hand when we cannot get even partial parity payments from the Treasury. I am therefore anxious to have legislation making permanent a farm price above that fixed by world markets. This bill has been in process for many months and represents the best thought of the most experienced and competent men who have been administering the Triple A Act, and of those who have been operating under it. I ask that it be carefully read and carefully considered by the House.

INCOME CERTIFICATE PLAN FOR BASIC EXPORT CROPS

In introducing a bill to carry out an income-certificate plan I feel that I am taking a step toward an increased and stabilized income for farmers. The measure I am proposing would raise funds to substitute for and augment parity payments and would thus strengthen the program we now have.

As I see it, however, the proposal has at least three important advantages over the program as it now stands.

First. It would raise more money for wheat and the other commodities named in the act than is being raised at present through appropriations for parity payments;

Second. It would be self-financing; and Third. It would assure farmers a continuing source for income which they must have if they are to continue farming.

The principle of the certificate plan is the same principle as that of the processing tax. Because of factors over which neither the Government nor farmers have control, wheat today is not bringing parity prices. It is now about 75 percent of parity, or 40 cents below a parity price. Under this bill a tax would be levied upon wheat, and the levy, minus the cost of administration, would be passed back to the farmers. In effect, the Government would be saying to millers and other wheat processors, "Pay farmers a fair price for their wheat."

The principle of the processing tax and the certificate plan is the same, but the certificate plan has some very definite advantages over the processing tax. It would be simpler to administer and the certificate plan, from the legal standpoint, would not involve a tax.

The money raised by the certificates on wheat, for example, would not go into the Treasury and then be paid out to farmers, as was the case with the processing tax. The funds raised by the certificate plan would go directly to farmers, and would not appear as appropriations. Through this short-cut one of the most frequent complaints in connection with the present program—that it takes too long for farmers to get the payments due them—would be largely eliminated.

CROPS COVERED

This bill would apply to wheat, tobacco, cotton, rice, and peanuts. The certificate plan can be used effectively for any crop which has a substantial export market, or has some outlet which would serve a similar purpose, such as the use of peanuts for oil.

I believe the certificate plan would be effective for all the crops named in the bill. I am certain it would be so for wheat. Since that is the commodity with which I am most familiar, my explanation of the bill is from the standpoint of the wheat farmer, although I believe that the same explanation holds good in the case of the other four crops.

Specifically, so far as wheat is concerned, the bill has as its aim the insurance of a parity price on that portion of the crop which is consumed domestically. Thus the value of the certificates for wheat would aggregate the difference between the actual price and parity price on the domestically consumed portion of the crop. Suggested minimum and maximum prices for the wheat certificates would be 10 and 25 cents per bushel.

COMPLIANCE NECESSARY FOR PAYMENTS

The certificates would be issued to farmers who cooperate in the Triple A wheat program. This would greatly strengthen the whole program and materially assist in bringing about much-needed acreage adjustment. From more than one standpoint this is desirable. Despite a series of short crops during the past few years, there has been no shortage of wheat in this country. Given normal weather, our tendency is to grow much too much instead of too little. Farmers should keep in mind that the domestically consumed portion of the wheat crop; that is, the portion consumed for food, is about 500,000,000 bushels annually.

Increasing the production of wheat would not result in more wheat consumption domestically, but it probably would decrease each individual farmer's share of the total domestic allotment. Every new wheat grower or every other increase which had to be taken into account in making the allotments would mean spreading the total thinner. In addition, the more wheat, the greater the surplus, the cheaper the price, the higher the value of the certificate, the greater the resistance from the processors, and the more difficult to sell the surplus abroad. If we encourage the expansion of wheat production, we will have to raise the maximum value of the certificates or abandon the idea of getting parity price on domestic consumption. There is too much unnecessary competition now among wheat farmers. I can see no reason to add to that competition.

PROCESSORS' CERTIFICATES

Processors would have to buy the certificates from farmers to cover the first sale of the commodity. To sell flour, for example, a miller would have to have certificates covering the quantity of wheat in the flour. The coverage of these first sales in the domestic market would require certificates corresponding to the number and value of the certificates issued to farmers.

Let us say, for example, that certificates valued at $119,000,000 were issued to wheat farmers, approximately the expected amount based on mill grindings. To cover first sales of the products manufactured from this wheat, wheat processors would have to buy $119,000,000 in certificates.

The yardstick to measure the value of certificates to be issued to an individual producer would be the normal yield of his acreage allotment under the farm program. Since the domestic consumption of wheat would be less than this normal yield of the allotted acres, the value of a wheat certificate per bushel would be somewhat less than the full difference between the farm and parity prices.

Importers of commodities made from wheat would have to purchase certificates to sell their products, but certificates would not be required for the export of wheat or wheat products. This would effectually eliminate imports.

To facilitate administration, a certificate pool would be set up by the Department of Agriculture, and this would make available and accessible an adequate supply of certificates.

ILLUSTRATION FOR WHEAT

The following illustrates how the marketing-certificate plan would operate for wheat:

ON NATIONAL BASIS (Assume this situation)	ON BASIS OF INDIVIDUAL FARMER (Assume this situation)
Normal production of allotment (bushels), 750,000,000.	Wheat-acreage allotment for farm (acres), 100.
Part of production consumed domestically for food (bushels), 500,000,000. The remainder of the production is exported or used for feed and seed.	Normal production per acre on farm's allotment (bushels), 12.
Market price of wheat per bushel ..... $0.75 Parity price of wheat per bushel 1.13	Wheat-conservation payment, 10 cents.
On basis of this assumed situation, the price is 38 cents below parity. In order to increase the income from the production consumed domestically, the 38 cents is applied to the 500,000,000 bushels. This would amount to $190,000,000, and would be the amount which the certificates would have to raise.	Since the normal production from the farmer's allotment is 1,200 bushels, he would receive 1,200 certificates, each worth 25 cents. He would receive these as soon as it was established that he had seeded within his acreage allotment.
Since the certificates would be issued on basis of the 750,000,000-bushel normal production (assuming 1 certificate for each bushel), the value of each certificate would be determined by dividing $190,000,000 by 750,000,000. This would be 25 cents—the value of the certificate received by the farmer.	On basis of figures used in this example, domestic consumption (excluding feed and seed) is two-thirds of the Nation's normal production. Likewise, the part of the farmer's crop going for domestic consumption as food is two-thirds of his normal production, or, in this case, 800 bushels. Under the certificate plan, this is what he would receive:
Since manufacturers and importers must buy 750,000,000 certificates in connection with the sale or importation of articles manufactured from 500,000,000 bushels of wheat, this means they will buy 1½ certificates for every bushel sold. Thus, the total cost per bushel of wheat for domestic consumption would be:
Market price ..... $0.75 1½ certificates at 25 cents ..... .37½ Total 1.12½	Sale in market (1,200 bushels at 75 cents) ... $900 1,200 certificates at 25 cents ..... 300 Conservation payment at 10 cents 120
This is approximately the parity price.	In other words, on his entire production, the farmer would receive $1,320, or $1.10 a bushel, which is 97 percent of parity. On just the portion of his crop consumed domestically as food, he would receive, in addition to his conservation payment, a total of $900, or $1.13 a bushel, which is parity.

ARGUMENTS REFUTED

The arguments against the certificate plan are familiar. The principal expressed opposition is that it would increase the cost to the consumer. In the case of wheat, this argument has little merit. In the first place, a tax of 30 cents a bushel on wheat—the rate under the processing tax and 5 cents more than the maximum rate proposed in the bill—added only about one-half cent a pound loaf to the cost of bread.

As anyone familiar with the subject knows, the cost of wheat is a relatively insignificant item in the cost of bread. During the price declines that sent wheat down to 25 cents a bushel back in 1932, the prices of bread remained comparatively high. At that time the millers emphasized that the cost of wheat did not amount to very much as a part of the cost of bread, and they called attention to other items. Now some of them want to change their tune.

In 1939 the average farm price paid to farmers for wheat was 64 cents per bushel. This price could have been doubled and farmers could have been paid approximately $1.25 per bushel without raising the cost of a loaf of bread more than 1 cent.

I propose that it should be required by law that every bread wrapper should contain a definite statement as to what part of the cost of the loaf of bread was due to the price of the wheat contained therein.

Generally speaking, consumers want farmers to get a fair price for their products. They know that this is best for everyone concerned, from the long-time viewpoint. The farm market is the best market industry has. If we bring out the fact that the certificate plan is simply an effort to raise to parity the price of wheat consumed in this country, and nothing more, I have no fear of consumer opposition.

It seems to me that those who oppose the certificate plan on the grounds that it would increase costs to consumers would oppose any increase in farm prices for the same reason. The demand for cheap food regardless of the welfare of American agricultural producers is not consistent with democracy.

The farmers must have parity payments or their equivalent if they are to continue to produce food. So far Congress has voted partial parity, but only after a struggle, and there is much uncertainty as to the future. With conditions as they are now, failure to get parity payments, or their equivalent, would mean ruin to many wheat farmers. The certificate plan would assure the equivalent of parity payments.

All of us have heard much talk about economy during the past few years. The certificate plan represents a genuine move toward economy. Without injury to anyone and with benefit to all, it would help make farm programs self-financing. The sooner this program is enacted the better for the farmers, the consumers, and the entire country.

In proposing this legislation I am assured the earnest support of the Washington State Farm Bureau and the Eastern Oregon Wheat League, both organizations of wheat farmers who have given much thought to the problems of the wheat sections, and who have repeatedly endorsed the certificate plan for financing the farm program.

My illustrations have applied to the production of wheat. The same arguments are applicable to all other basic commodities mentioned in the bill—cotton, tobacco, rice, and peanuts. I have, in introducing this important bill, referred to wheat because I am so familiar with wheat farming and marketing.

This bill is not an entirely new bill in itself, but it amends the 1938 Farm Act under which we have been operating so successfully.

EXPENDITURES IN GOVERNMENT

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but call attention to a statement made by the acting chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] on last Thursday when he said:

> We have made a record not only in efficient and expeditious manner in which we have reported the supply bills—and what is more important—in economy in appropriations carried by these bills.

I want to say that the acting chairman of the Committee on Appropriations does not know what economy means, after he says that the bills were economical, when we find that we have appropriated $6,776,658,767.57, and the income next year will be $5,703,000,000, as estimated by the President. Where is there any economy when our appropriations are now over a billion dollars more than our receipts will be? Where can any Member of Congress laud this radical spending? Why, Mr. Speaker, you have been in the red from a billion and a half a year up since the New Deal hit the Capital. Every year you have been in the red. Economy where? Not with the New Deal. They are the squanderers of the world; more waste, more extravagance, more promises than any party has ever had. The New Deal is busted, and it will bust all our people.

A list of the 11 regular appropriations bills appropriates out of the Federal Treasury to date, as follows:

Agriculture (passed the Senate)	$922,911,213.00
District of Columbia (reported to the House)	48,291,717.00
Independent offices (passed the Senate)	1,139,783,528.00

Treasury and Post Office (law)	1,032,801,095.00
War Department, civil (passed the House)	203,472,567.00
Emergency, supplemental (law)	252,340,776.00
Urgent deficiency (law)	57,541,300.00
First deficiency (passed the Senate)	91,533,408.52
District of Columbia	6,000,000.00
War	784,999,094.00
Total	6,776,658,767.57

Mr. Speaker, we want to chase the money changers out of the White House and out of Congress if we are going to save this Nation of ours. Now, where are the economic royalists? We are putting the financial skids under this Nation. We soon will be a bankrupt nation. Oncoming generations will not be able to carry on the folly that this New Deal administration is heaping upon their heads. [Applause.]

LETTERS, MANUSCRIPTS, AND PERSONAL PAPERS OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I have just introduced a joint resolution authorizing the appropriation of $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the Library of Congress to purchase the William H. Herndon collection of manuscripts, letters, and other personal papers of Abraham Lincoln.

It has been the uniform policy of the Congress to place in the Library of Congress all documents of historic value. Last year $55,000 was appropriated for the purchase of the papers of Charles C. Pinckney, an important figure in the early days of our history. By this policy we seek to preserve for posterity all papers, objects, and effects connected with the lives of our great statesmen.

When Lincoln left Springfield, Ill., for Washington to assume the office of President of the United States he asked his law partner, William H. Herndon, to keep the old shingle, "Lincoln & Herndon," until he returned. Fate decreed that the martyred Lincoln would not return to the practice of law he loved.

Shortly after the death of Abraham Lincoln, Herndon began collecting all available material relating to the life of the martyred President. In the Herndon collection there are precious mementoes of Lincoln's boyhood. For instance, it contains one of the early arithmetic lessons.

The collection also contains something like 750 legal papers executed by Lincoln in his own handwriting, all of which throw light on his skill as a laywer in handling cases and clients.

I do not desire to take the time of the House now to enter into the details of the documents and papers in the Herndon collection. I simply desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that I have introduced this resolution because I am convinced that we should take appropriate steps to preserve these valuable manuscripts and papers. I sincerely hope the Committee on the Library will look into this particular matter.

It is hardly necessary to say that we, in Illinois, cherished every paper and every object that pertains to our native son, Abraham Lincoln. He was the embodiment of the American spirit—patience, courage, humility, and belief in the rights of the common man. Everything that touches upon his life and work is dear to the American people and should be placed where it may be preserved for all time.

COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities, I present a privileged report (Rept. No. 1936) and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities authorized by the House of Representatives by House Resolution 282, Seventy-fifth Congress, and continued by House Resolution 26, Seventy-sixth Congress, and House Resolution 321, Seventy-sixth Congress, caused to be issued a subpena directing one Philip Frankfeld to appear before the said Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities and to produce all records regarding Communist Party and activities, the subpena being set forth in words and figures, as follows:

"By authority of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America, to the Sergeant at Arms, or his special messenger: You are hereby commanded to summon Philip Frankfeld to be and appear before the Special Committee on Un-American Activities, committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, of which the Honorable MARTIN DIES, of Texas, is chairman, and bring with you all files, records, and correspondence pertaining to the business of the Communist Party which are in your possession and under your control for the period from January 1, 1935, to date. These records should also include the following: Membership books, cards, receipts for payment of dues, receipts for contributions, membership lists. Receipts for monies or services from any and all other sources. Mailing lists and correspondence lists, ledgers, journals, and any and all records pertaining to receipts and disbursements. In their chamber in the city of Washington, forthwith, at the hour of, then and there to testify touching matters of inquiry committed to said committee; and he is not to depart without leave of said committee. Herein fail not, and make return of this summons.

"Witness my hand and seal of the House of Representatives of the United States, at the city of Washington, this 29th day of March 1940.

"W. B. BANKHEAD, Speaker.

"Attest:

"SOUTH TRIMBLE, Clerk."

Said subpena was, on March 29, 1940, served upon the said Philip Frankfeld by George F. Hurley, an employee of the said Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities, and duly authorized to serve the said subpena. The return of a service by the said George F. Hurley being endorsed thereon, which is set forth in words and figures, as follows:

"Subpena for Philip Frankfeld before the committee of the Special Committee on Un-American Activities. Served by George F. Hurley, investigator, March 29, 1940. Sergeant at Arms, House of Representatives."

Said Philip Frankfeld, pursuant to said subpena and in compliance therewith, appeared before the said committee to give such testimony and to produce such records as required under and by virtue of House Resolution 282, Seventy-fifth Congress, and continued by House Resolution 26, Seventy-sixth Congress, and House Resolution 321, Seventy-sixth Congress.

Said Philip Frankfeld, after being duly sworn by the chairman, gave testimony before the said committee on the 4th day of April 1940 concerning certain matters and things, but refused to give testimony and to answer certain questions propounded to him on the following matters and things:

"Mr. MATTHEWS. Will you please state your full name?

"Mr. FRANKFELD. I will not answer a single question until you permit those 10,000 citizens to be heard.

"The CHAIRMAN. Shall we hold the witness in contempt? The witness is held in contempt. Let the record show that. You are not making any other statement. You are directed to answer questions, and you have declined to answer.

"Mr. FRANKFELD. And you declined to listen to 10,000 citizens of our country.

"The CHAIRMAN. You decline to answer any question. Remove the witness."

Because of the foregoing the said Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities has been deprived of the testimony of said Philip Frankfeld, relative to the subject matter, which under House Resolution 282, Seventy-fifth Congress, and continued by House Resolution 26, Seventy-sixth Congress, and House Resolution 321, Seventy-sixth Congress, said Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities was instructed to investigate, and the willful and deliberate refusal of the witness to testify further as hereinbefore set forth is a violation of the subpena under which the witness had previously appeared and testified, and his willful refusal to testify further, without having been first excused as a witness deprives the said Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities of necessary and pertinent testimony, and places the said witness in contempt of the House of Representatives of the United States.

House Resolution 457

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives certify the report of the House of Representatives Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities as to the willful and deliberate refusal of Philip Frankfeld to testify before the said Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities, together with all of the facts in connection therewith, under seal of the House of Representatives, to the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Philip Frankfeld may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I move the immediate consideration of a resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 457

Resolution to certify report of the House of Representatives Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia to proceed against Philip Frankfeld for contempt

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives certify the report of the House of Representatives Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities as to the willful and deliberate refusal of Philip Frankfeld to testify before the said Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities, together with all of the facts in connection therewith, under seal of the House of Representatives, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Philip Frankfeld may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

The resolution was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Un-American Activities, I present a privileged report (Rept. No. 1937) and ask that it be read:

The Clerk read as follows:

The Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities, authorized by the House of Representatives by House Resolution 282, Seventy-fifth Congress, and continued by House Resolution 26, Seventy-sixth Congress, and House Resolution 321, Seventy-sixth Congress, caused to be issued a subpena directing one Dr. Albert Blumberg to appear before the said Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities and to produce all records regarding Communist Party and activities, the subpena being set forth in words and figures as follows:

"By authority of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America, to the Sergeant at Arms or his special messenger: You are hereby commanded to summon Dr. Albert Blumberg, 501 B North Eutaw Street, Baltimore, Md., to be and appear before the Special Committee on Un-American Activities, committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, of which the Honorable MARTIN DIES, of Texas, is chairman, and bring with you all documents, records, and/or correspondence pertaining to the business of the Communist Party and/or to the activities of individual members of the Communist Party; all membership books or cards, receipts for payment of dues, receipts for contributions, receipts for moneys or services from other sources; all records of membership, mailing, and/or correspondence lists; ledgers, journals, and all records of all receipts and disbursements, in their chamber in the city of Washington forthwith, at the hour of ———, then and there to testify touching matters of inquiry committed to said committee; and he is not to depart without leave of said committee. Herein fail not, and make return of this summons.

"Witness my hand and the seal of the House of Representatives of the United States, at the city of Washington, this 29th day of March 1940.

[SEAL] "W. B. BANKHEAD, Speaker.

"Attest:

"SOUTH TRIMBLE, Clerk."

Said subpena was on March 29, 1940, served upon the said Dr. Albert Blumberg by United States Deputy Gustavus H. Ward. The return of a service by the said Gustavus H. Ward being endorsed thereon which is set forth in words and figures as follows:

"Summoned the within-named Dr. Albert Blumberg, at 501 B North Eutaw Street, Baltimore, Md., and a copy of subpena duces tecum handed to him personally at 1:30 p. m. this 29th day of March 1940.

"AUGUST KLECKA, United States Marshal,
"By GUSTAVUS H. WARD, Deputy."

Said Dr. Albert Blumberg, pursuant to said subpena and in compliance therewith, appeared before a subcommittee of the said committee to give such testimony and to produce such records as required under and by virtue of House Resolution 282, Seventy-fifth Congress, and continued by House Resolution 26, Seventy-sixth Congress, and House Resolution 321, Seventy-sixth Congress.

Said Dr. Albert Blumberg, after being duly sworn by the chairman, gave testimony before a subcommittee of the said committee on the 29th day of March 1940 concerning certain matters and things, but refused to give testimony and to answer certain questions propounded to him on the following matters and things:

"Mr. MATTHEWS. Is Barbara Hutton, known as such by her party name, a member of the Communist Party in Baltimore?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. Mr. Chairman, for reasons previously given, I decline to answer any question designed to identify any individual as a member of the Communist Party.

"The CHAIRMAN. What I am trying to get you to do is to say whether you decline to answer this particular question.

"Mr. BLUMBERG. I decline to answer this question, and any such question designed to identify——

"The CHAIRMAN. We will get to the others. Do I understand you to decline to answer this particular question for the reasons you previously stated?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. Yes. I decline to answer any question regarding the party status of an individual, and this is such a question.

"The CHAIRMAN. I am asking you, do you decline to answer this particular question for the reasons stated?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. Yes; since this question relates to alleged party membership.

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requires you to answer the question. Do you still decline?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. Yes; I decline (Mar. 29, 1940, record, pp. 87–88).

"Mr. MATTHEWS. Who is the secretary of the Young Communist League in Baltimore?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. Mr. Chairman, I decline to answer——

"Mr. MATTHEWS. Isn't that a matter of public record?

"Mr. BLUMBERG (continuing). On the ground that this question is not germane to the purposes of the inquiry.

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requires you to answer the question. Do you still decline?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. I decline (Mar. 29, 1940, record, pp. 88–29).

"Mr. MATTHEWS. This morning there was introduced into evidence before this committee, Dr. Blumberg, a memorandum which had to do with the removal of Joan Davis from the post of regional administrative secretary of the Young Communist League in Baltimore on the ground that Joan Davis had had dinner with her brother and had then invited him to stay overnight in her home, and furthermore that her brother was identified by this memorandum as being on tour for a Trotskyite organization.

"Do you know the Joan Davis referred to in this document?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. Mr. Chairman, for reasons previously stated, I decline to answer any question concerning documents taken from the office.

"The CHAIRMAN. You decline to answer this question?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. I decline to answer this question, or any question——

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requires you to answer this question. Do you still decline?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. I decline, because I believe them to have been improperly seized (May 29, 1940, record, p. 89).

"Mr. MATTHEWS. I show you a canceled check dated January 25, 1938, on the Drovers & Mechanics Office, Maryland Trust Co., 'Pay to the order of A. Benson, $161.87,' signed by the Communist Party of Maryland, Joan Davis, secretary, district office.

"The CHAIRMAN. What check is it?

"Mr. MATTHEWS. The check is dated Baltimore, Md., October 28, 1938, payable to A. Benson, for $167.27, signed Joan Davis, secretary, Communist Party, Maryland.

"The CHAIRMAN. What question are you asking with reference to that check?

"Mr. MATTHEWS. If he will identify this check.

"The CHAIRMAN. That doesn't purport to have any signature of his on it?

"Mr. MATTHEWS. It is a check which was obtained from the files of the Communist Party in Baltimore.

"The CHAIRMAN. I understand. Let me ask you this, Doctor: did you ever see that check before?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. Mr. Chairman, I again decline to answer any question in relation to the documents taken yesterday, on the grounds previously stated.

"The CHAIRMAN. If you will just confine it to the particular question. I am asking you did you ever see that check before. You decline to answer?

"Mr. COHN. He declines to answer.

"The CHAIRMAN. Although the Chair requires you to do so?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. I decline to answer (Mar. 29, 1940, record, pp. 90–91).

"Mr. MATTHEWS. I hold a check dated Baltimore, Md., October 8, 1938, payable to A. Benson, for $382.70, signed Communist Party of Maryland, Joan Davis, Secretary, District Office.

"Have you ever seen that check?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. Mr. Chairman, I again decline to answer the question on the grounds previously stated.

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requires you to do so, and you decline?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. On the grounds previously stated.

"The CHAIRMAN. May I ask you if you know who A. Benson is?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. Mr. Chairman, I decline to answer any question relating to individuals other than myself.

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requires you to answer this particular question. Do you know who A. Benson is?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. I decline to answer (Mar. 29, 1940, record, pp. 91–92).

"The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Will you read the last question?

(Whereupon the reporter read the question referred to, as follows:)

"You don't know in October, you mean to say, that William Wiener was the financial secretary of the Communist Party of the United States?

"The CHAIRMAN. You decline to answer that question?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. I decline to answer the question.

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requires you to answer. Do you still decline?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. I still decline (Mar. 29, 1940, record, p. 94).

"Mr. MATTHEWS. Do you mean to say, Dr. Blumberg, that the Communist Party of Maryland, of which you are the responsible head, would make out a check for $10 to a person about whom you have no recollection?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. Mr. Chairman, I again refuse to answer any questions with regard to the material——

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you decline to answer the question?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. Taken from our office yesterday.

"The CHAIRMAN. Stick with the particular question. Do you decline to answer this particular question?

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requires the witness to answer. The witness refuses.

"Mr. BLUMBERG. I decline to answer (Mar. 29, 1940, record, pp. 96–97).

"Mr. MATTHEWS. Do all expenditures made by the Communist Party of Maryland have to be O. K.'d by you?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. As the State secretary of the organization, I am acquainted with the expenditures that are made.

"The CHAIRMAN. That doesn't answer his question. The question is, Do expenditures have to be authorized by you?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. The expenditures have to be authorized by a committee, of which I would be one member.

"The CHAIRMAN. What committee is that?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. Most major expenditures would be authorized by the State executive committee.

"The CHAIRMAN. The State executive committee?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. That is right.

"The CHAIRMAN. And you are a member of the committee?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. I am a member of the committee.

"The CHAIRMAN. And as secretary of the organization, does the committee control your actions?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. It does.

"Mr. LYNCH. Who are the other members of the committee, Mr. Blumberg?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. Mr. Chairman, I decline to answer any question which has for its purpose the identification of any individual——

"Mr. BLUMBERG. Yes; I refuse to answer any questions with regard to any individual.

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requires the witness to answer. The witness declines. is that correct?

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requires you to answer it. Do you still decline?

"Mr. BLUMBERG. That is correct (record, Mar. 29 1940, p. 104).

"Mr. MATTHEWS. I have another letter on the letterhead of the Daily Worker, addressed to Albert Blumber, 501–A North Eutaw Street, Baltimore, Md., signed 'Solomon.'

"Mr. MATTHEWS. Is Carl Brenn the district administrative secretary at the present time?

Because of the foregoing the said subcommittee of the said Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities has been deprived of the testimony of said Dr. Albert Blumberg, relative to subject matter which, under House Resolution 282, Seventy-fifth Congress, and continued by House Resolution 26, Seventy-sixth Congress, and House Resolution 321, Seventy-sixth Congress, said Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities was instructed to investigate, and the willful and deliberate refusal of the witness to testify further as hereinbefore set forth is a violation of the subpena under which the witness had previously appeared and testified and his willful refusal to testify further without having been first excused as a witness deprives the subcommittee of the said Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities of necessary and pertinent testimony and places the said witness in contempt of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I move the immediate consideration of a resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 458

Resolution to certify report of the House of Representatives Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia to proceed against Dr. Albert Blumberg for contempt

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives certify the report of the House of Representatives Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities as to the willful and deliberate refusal of Dr. Albert Blumberg to testify before a subcommittee of the said Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities together with all of the facts in connection therewith, under seal of the House of Representatives to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia to the end that the said Dr. Albert Blumberg may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

The resolution was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities, I present a privileged report (Rept. No. 1938) and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities authorized by the House of Representatives by House Resolution 282, Seventy-fifth Congress, and continued by House Resolution 26, Seventy-sixth Congress, and House Resolution 321, Seventy-sixth Congress, caused to be issued a subpena directing one Thomas F. P. O'Dea to appear before the said Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities and to produce all records regarding Communist Party and activities; the subpena being set forth in words and figures as follows:

"By authority of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America, to the Sergeant at Arms, or his special messenger: You are hereby commanded to summon Thomas F. P. O'Dea, 15 Essex Street, Boston, Mass., to be and appear before the Special Committee on Un-American Activities Committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, of which the Honorable MARTIN DIES, of Texas, is chairman, all correspondence, etc., in their chamber in the city of Washington, forthwith, at the hour of, then and there to testify touching matters of inquiry committed to said committee; and he is not to depart without leave of said committee. Herein fail not, and make return of this summons.

"Witness my hand and the seal of the House of Representatives of the United States, at the city of Washington, this 29th day of March 1940.

"W. B. BANKHEAD, Speaker.

"Attest:

"SOUTH TRIMBLE, Clerk."

Said subpena was on March 29, 1940, served upon the said Thomas F. P. O'Dea by Charles A. Randall, an employee of the said Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities and duly authorized to serve the said subpena. The return of a service by the said Charles A. Randall being endorsed thereon, which is set forth in words and figures, as follows:

"Subpena for Thomas F. P. O'Dea, before the Committee on the Special Committee on Un-American Activities. Served March 29, 1940, by Charles A. Randall. Sergeant at Arms, House of Representatives."

Said Thomas F. P. O'Dea, pursuant to said subpena and in compliance therewith, appeared before the said committee to give such testimony and to produce such records as required under and by virtue of House Resolution 282, Seventy-fifth Congress, and continued by House Resolution 26, Seventy-sixth Congress, and House Resolution 321, Seventy-sixth Congress.

Said Thomas F. P. O'Dea, after being duly sworn by the chairman, gave testimony before the said committee on the 3d day of April 1940 concerning certain matters and things, but refused to give testimony and to answer certain questions propounded to him on the following matters and things:

"Mr. MATTHEWS. Who is the secretary of the Harvard Young Communist League?

"Mr. O'DEA. I refuse to answer that question, because I believe by answering that question I will expose this person to economic persecution. He will be unable to get a job, and getting a job is the only way he will be able to live, and I think, under the fourteenth amendment, that is due process; his only property will be his scholarship and his job, and he will lose that. * * *

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will take under advisement the question of whether a witness can state the reasons for his declining to answer. The Chair is not familiar with the decisions with respect to that, but for the time being we will take that under advisement. The Chair now directs you to answer the question that was asked you. Do you decline to do so?

"Mr. O'DEA. I do, for the reasons stated.

"The CHAIRMAN. You have already said that. You decline to answer the question?

"Mr. O'DEA. I do, for the reasons stated (Apr. 3, 1940, record, pp. 14–16).

"Mr. MATTHEWS. Who is the 'Charlotte' referred to in your article prepared for the Review, on page 4?

"Mr. O'DEA. A member of the Young Communist League.

"Mr. MATTHEWS. He refers to 'Charlotte,' such as the one that Charlotte described.

"What is Charlotte's last name?

"Mr. O'DEA. For the same reason as before, I feel that I will not give her last name.

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair directs you to give her last name and you decline to do so; is that correct?

"Mr. O'DEA. For the reason I stated in the previous case (Apr. 3, 1940, record, p. 37).

"The CHAIRMAN. You stated that you knew the names of 25 of the members of the Young Communist League in Harvard. You stated that?

"Mr. O'DEA. Approximately; I think that I do.

"The CHAIRMAN. Will you state to the committee the names of those that you do know?

"Mr. O'DEA. I refuse to state those names.

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair directs you to do so and you decline to do so; is that correct?

"Mr. O'DEA. I decline for the reason that I stated (Apr. 3, 1940, record, p. 42).

"The CHAIRMAN. In the event of a war between the United States and Russia, would you support the United States?

"Mr. COHN. I object to this question on the ground that it is hypothetical.

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you decline to answer it?

"Mr. O'DEA. I decline to answer it. I don't think it is at all a realistic question.

"The CHAIRMAN. You decline to say whether or not you will support this country in the event we were to enter war with Russia on the opposite side; is that correct?

"Mr. O'DEA. I decline to answer the question. It is a matter of opinion, and I don't see how I can have an opinion on hypothetical question (Apr. 3, 1940, record, p. 42–43).

"Mr. LYNCH. Can you give us the names of any of the branch presidents?

"Mr. O'DEA. I refuse to give those names for the reason I stated when I refused to give other names.

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what their names are?

"Mr. O'DEA. Most of them.

"The CHAIRMAN. And you decline to give the committee any of the names of any of the branch presidents that you know about?

"Mr. O'DEA. For the reasons I stated before.

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair directs the witness to answer the question and the witness declines to do so; is that correct?

"Mr. O'DEA. For the reasons stated before (Apr. 3, 1940, record, p. 52).

"Mr. MATTHEWS. The notation in this letter is 'Her book number is H–224.'

"Is 'P' the secretary of the Worcester Young Communist League or the President of the Worcester Young Communist League?

"Mr. O'DEA. President, I think.

"Mr. MATTHEWS. The letter 'P' is given as the author of this letter, and he described 'P' as the president of the Worcester Branch of the Young Communist League. I have not asked him for further details about 'P's' name.

"Mr. O'DEA. I decline to give that name.

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair directs the witness to answer the question, and the witness declines to do so.

"Mr. O'DEA. For the reasons stated before (Apr. 3, 1940, record, p. 58).

"The CHAIRMAN. How many members of the board do you have?

"Mr. O'DEA. About 10.

"The CHAIRMAN. Ten members of the board?

"Mr. O'DEA. Yes.

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you know who they are?

"Mr. O'DEA. Yes.

"The CHAIRMAN. Will you state to the committee who the members of the board are?

"Mr. O'DEA. I refuse for the reasons stated before.

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair directs you to answer that question, and you decline to do so; is that correct?

"Mr. O'DEA. The giving of these people's names will result in their economic persecution, and I am not going to be a party to that.

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you decline?

"Mr. O'OEA. I decline to answer that on my constitutional rights (Apr. 3, 1940, record, p. 73).

Because of the foregoing the said Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities has been deprived of the testimony of said Thomas F. P. O'Dea, relative to the subject matter, which under House Resolution 282, Seventy-fifth Congress, and continued by House Resolution 26, Seventy-sixth Congress, and House Resolution 321, Seventy-sixth Congress, said Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities was instructed to investigate, and the willful and deliberate refusal of the witness to testify further as hereinbefore set forth is a violation of the subpena under which the witness had previously appeared and testified, and his willful refusal to testify further without first having been excused as a witness deprives the said Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities of necessary and pertinent testimony and places the said witness in contempt of the House of Representatives of the United States.

House Resolution 458

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives certify the report of the House of Representatives Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities as to the willful and deliberate refusal of Thomas F. P. O'Dea to testify before the said Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities, together with all of the facts in connection therewith, under seal of the House of Representatives, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia to the end that the said Thomas F. P. O'Dea may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I move the immediate consideration of a resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 459

Resolution to certify report of the House of Representatives Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia to proceed against Thomas F. P. O'Dea for contempt

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives certify the report of the House of Representatives Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities as to the willful and deliberate refusal of Thomas F. P. O'Dea to testify before the said Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities, together with all of the facts in connection therewith, under seal of the House of Representatives, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia to the end that the said Thomas F. P. O'Dea may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

The resolution was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered; but the Chair will state that the Chair does not desire to recognize any other Member to speak today.

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for 1 minute to inquire of the chairman of the Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities what that committee proposes to do by way of investigating and exposing foreign propaganda in the United States, whether that propaganda be British, French, Nazi, or Communist.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I may say in answer to the gentleman from New York that we have been doing considerable work on that over a long period. We have men working on it now, investigating organizations that are disseminating propaganda which originated from a foreign source, who are investigating newspaper stories that purport to have a foreign date line but in fact are manufactured in the United States. We are investigating lecturers who come to the United States who formerly received from $500 to $1,000 to lecture but who now come to the United States and lecture for nothing in order that through the medium of our forums and other public institutions they may disseminate their views with respect to this present conflict in Europe.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman proposes to carry on this investigation?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

VETO MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—DEPORTATION OF ALIENS

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following veto message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I am returning herewith, without my approval, a bill (H. R. 6724) "To provide for the prompt deportation of aliens engaging in espionage or sabotage, alien criminals, and other undesirable aliens."

This bill provides for the deportation of three classes of aliens, irrespective of whether they entered the United States before or after passage of the act.

In the first group are aliens who have been convicted or have voluntarily admitted in writing that they have engaged in espionage or sabotage affecting the national defense or the foreign relations of the United States, since entering into the United States.

I am in full accord with the view that the Government should be empowered to deal firmly and effectively with persons guilty of espionage or sabotage. With that end in view, several months ago I instructed the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice to coordinate and take charge of the investigation of offenses of this character, in conjunction with the Military and Naval Intelligence Services. A few days ago I approved a bill that substantially increased the maximum penalties that may be imposed on persons convicted of such crimes. Ample authority is found in the existing law for the deportation of aliens guilty of such activities, for the Secretary of Labor is already authorized to deport them if, after hearing, it is found that they are undesirable residents of the United States (U. S. Code, title 8, sec. 157). Further legislation on this subject appears to be unnecessary and superfluous.

The second group of aliens to which the bill relates are those who, at any time, have been convicted of a violation of any Federal or State narcotic law. At present, only such alien narcotic violators are subject to deportation as have been convicted under Federal statutes. I have no criticism of this provision of the bill.

The third group of aliens whose mandatory deportation would be required, if this bill were approved, comprises those who at any time, either before or after the passage of the act, have been lawfully committed to a public or private institution as habitual users of narcotic drugs. While severe treatment should properly be meted out to purveyors of narcotics, enlightened consideration of the entire subject inescapably leads to the conclusion that this principle does not necessarily apply to the unfortunate addicts of drugs, who do not participate in peddling them to others. Addiction to narcotics is to be regarded as a lamentable disease, rather than as a crime. It does not seem clear why aliens who acquire this weakness should be singled out for deportation. The rigor and harshness of the proposal is enhanced by making no distinction between aliens who acquire the habit after their arrival in this country and those who had it previously; between aliens who are cured of the habit as a result of treatment in an institution and those who prove incurable; or between those who have been treated in such institutions at some time in the past and those who may be committed to institutions hereafter. It is not improbable that the mandatory character of this legislation, coupled with its retroactive features, as well as lack of consideration for persons who are cured after treatment, may result in hardship not commensurate with the benefits to be derived from this legislation by the community.

In the light of these considerations, I am constrained to return this bill without my approval.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 6, 1940.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The objections of the President will be spread upon the Journal.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and the bill be referred to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization and ordered printed.

He was one of my close personal friends in this body and one of the most conscientious Members of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair may say that the so-called judges' conduct bill will be called up for consideration at that time.

THE LATE THOMAS S. WILLIAMS

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PARSONS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I know that the House will hear with profound sorrow of the passing of the Honorable Thomas S. Williams, judge of the United States Court of Claims, who passed away Friday morning at his home here in Washington.

Judge Williams, a former Member of Congress from the Twenty-fourth Illinois District, has served 42 years of public service for his State and Nation. He graduated from law school and was admitted to the Illinois bar in 1896. Two years later he was elected to the Illinois State Legislature, where he served for one term. He was afterward elected State's attorney of Clay County, Ill., for two terms, and in 1914 was elected a Representative in Congress from the Twenty-fourth Illinois District. He was reelected seven times, serving 15 years in this body.

When he was appointed by President Herbert Hoover as a member of the Court of Claims, he was ranking member of the Agricultural Committee of the House, a member of the Rules Committee, and ranking member of the Republican Committee on Committees. He wielded a great deal of influence in the Congress, and it was because of his influence that he was named by President Hoover to the Court of Claims.

He was an authority on agriculture while a Member of the House because he represented an agricultural district. As a member of the Court of Claims his chief justice, Richard S. Whaley, had this to say of his service as a member of the court:

> Mr. Williams' decisions were distinguished for their clarity with which his opinions were stated and the broad knowledge of law which they displayed.

He leaves surviving him his wife, Mrs. Mabel S. Williams; his son, Harold S. Williams, a practicing attorney of Taylorville, Ill.; and two daughters, Mrs. Ruth Hanson, of New Orleans, La., and Mrs. Alice Browne, of Falls Church, Va.

Southern Illinois has lost a great native son and the Nation a judge and a statesman.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by printing a radio speech delivered by Mr. Phil T. Rich, editor of the Midland News-Times, Midland, Mich., on the development of the chemical industry in my congressional district.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD with regard to the activities of the Joint Forestry Committee appointed by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DOXEY]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a resolution adopted by American citizens of Polish origin or descent of Buffalo, N. Y.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARTER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter that I have received.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK]?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maine [Mr. OLIVER].

THE LATE CLYDE H. SMITH

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, it is with the deepest regret that I rise this morning to announce the passing into the Great Beyond of our colleague, CLYDE H. SMITH, of Maine. His passing was gentle and merciful and for that we are and shall be thankful, but, because of its suddenness, it is a great shock to all, especially those of us who knew him intimately and well.

Clyde was a fine soldier in the interests of the rank and file of the people. During his many years of public service which have extended over nearly half a century he has constantly and consistently stood firmly for the principles in which he so ardently believed. Always a valiant fighter for those who labor, he sought an appointment to the House Committee on Labor and for the past 4 years has been in the midst and the thick of all the many legislative controversies which have been under the consideration of that congressional group during that period. Having been a pioneer in the principle of old-age pensions, he has made his name more than familiar to the people of our State and the Nation who are particularly interested in this phase of our economic life. He has always shown in his legislative career a fine sense of balance and proportion which has enabled him to do good service for all in the light of the many extreme demands which are often made by those most ardent on both sides of any issue.

Clyde has always been a humble man, unassuming and unpretentious; he has been extremely conscientious and devoted to duty; at his desk almost until the very moment of his untimely passing, he, through his actions, has epitomized his determined consecration to the best welfare of his constituents.

I have learned through personal contact with him during the past several years to lean heavily upon his judgment, and I feel that in his passing away I have suffered the loss of a true friend. I know that literally thousands in our State of Maine have suffered a similar loss.

The following few words taken from the pen of a great son of Maine, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, characterize with peculiar appropriateness the real personality of our deceased colleague in always thinking in terms of the best for others:

A man of such a genial mood
The heart of all things he embraced
And yet of such fastidious taste,
He never found the best too good.

On Tuesday, April 9, at 1 p. m., brief and informal services will be held in his memory at his Washington home, located at 3028 Newark Street NW. It is our wish that Members of the House who may desire to do so, will attend these services.

Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 460

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. CLYDE H. SMITH, a Representative from the State of Maine.

Resolved, That a committee of four Members of the House with such Members of the Senate as may be joined be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this resolution and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate this resolution to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to, and the Speaker pro tempore appointed the following as members of the funeral committee on the part of the House: Mrs. NORTON, of New Jersey; Mr. WELCH, of California; Mr. BREWSTER, of Maine; and Mr. OLIVER, of Maine.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the remainder of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

SENATE

TUESDAY, APRIL 9, 1940

(Legislative day of Monday, April 8, 1940)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Mystery of God, before which we kneel and are silent, breathe on us with quickening breath from Thy secret holy place, that our spirits may be warmed with new throbs of aspiration and our hearts made to kindle and to glow within us, as we meditate and muse upon the way by which Thou art leading us.

We dare not pray only for ourselves, our leaders, and our citizens, for unto Thee all nations are dear, and so we beseech Thee especially to look upon those who are plagued by this terrible scourge of war, and grant to them and to us the blessing of an enlightened mind. Do Thou forgive the wrongs men suffer at each other's hands, and quicken their consciences with a vision of the true destiny to which Thou dost call them in friendship and fellowship with all the peoples of the earth. So move upon the minds of all of us that hatred and malice, all pride and vain ambition may be set aside, to the creating of a new and better order for our world, wherein we shall show forth a zeal for justice transfigured by the spirit of Christ's love for all his brethren. We ask it in His name and for His sake. Amen.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Whereas for the purpose of preserving the domestic cane sugar refining industry against the inroads of tropical competition, Congress, in the year 1934 and again in the year 1937, enacted certain legislation designed to accomplish this purpose; and

Whereas the legislation enacted in the year 1937, commonly known as the Sugar Act of 1937, has greatly aided in preserving and protecting the cane sugar refining industry in continental United States, and particularly in New York State and States adjacent thereto where many citizens and residents of New York State are employed, thereby directly relieving, to a great extent, the unemployment situation prevalent in the State of New York, as well as in the United States; and

Whereas the said Sugar Act of 1937 will expire and cease to be of effect during the year 1940: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That Congress be, and it hereby is, respectfully memorialized to reenact the provisions of the legislation known as the Sugar Act of 1937 and/or other suitable legislation for the protection and preservation of the cane sugar refining industry in continental United States; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Member of the present Congress from the State of New York, and that they be urged to use their best efforts to accomplish the purpose of this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Whereas the Legislature of the State of New York has previously memorialized the Congress of the United States to enact such legislation as will effectively prevent lynching outrages which continue to occur from time to time in some of the Southern and Southwestern States; and

Whereas such legislation is urgently needed to restore in our people respect for law and order; and

Whereas one branch of the Congress of the United States, to wit, the House of Representatives, has already passed such legislation, namely, the Gavagan bill, H. R. 801, which, in the judgment of the people of the State of New York, would accomplish the desired results; and

Whereas this bill is now pending in the Senate of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the Senate of the United States be, and is hereby, respectfully memorialized to enact with all convenient speed the Gavagan bill, any appropriate legislation which will prevent the punishment or destruction of persons accused or suspected of crime in any other way or by any other authority than by due process of law and by a duly constituted court of justice; and be it further

Resolved (if the senate concur), That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Secretary of the Senate and to each Member of Congress elected from the State of New York, and that the latter be urged to use his best efforts in obtaining the passage of the legislation referred to herein.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a memorial from David Blatt, president of Local No. 45, S. C. M. W. A. (C. I. O.), of New York City, N. REIMBURSEMENT OF COTTON COOPERATIVES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2585, to reimburse the cotton cooperative associations for losses occasioned by the Federal Farm Board's stabilization operations, and for other purposes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, does the Senator from Alabama desire to explain his bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I first want it taken up.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire recognition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, we have a very remarkable situation growing out of this bill. This is the second time it has come before the Senate. The first time it came before the Senate was about 5 years ago, when the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER]—a well-known Senator, a perfectly splendid man, gentle, kindly, devoted to the farmers; there is not a finer man anywhere in the world—introduced a bill which included this claim for the relief of the American Cotton Cooperative Association. The bill at that time proposed to give them about $5,000,000 in addition to the amount they had already received from the Government.

Why the American Cotton Cooperative Association should have gone to the well-known cotton-growing State of North Dakota to find a cotton-growing Senator to introduce their to me. It was done, however, and I had to fight the bill for bill for relief on cotton has not been quite fully explained about 3 or 4 years; and it was finally defeated so far as the cotton cooperatives were concerned. However, so far as the wheat growers were concerned, that bill passed after being modified. As passed, the bill sent to the Court of Claims the claims of wheat farmers for reconsideration of an agreement of 10 years ago by which the wheat farmers had settled their matters with the Government. A few days ago the Court of Claims entered an order dismissing that claim.

So much for the wheat claim.

The cotton-cooperative claim took another turn. The cotton cooperatives—not the present American Cotton Cooperative Association at all, but what was then known as the American Cotton Growers' Exchange—in 1929 lost the little sum of $139,000,000, largely in gambling on cotton. The American Cotton Cooperative Association, which now presents this claim to the Congress of the United States, was not then in existence. It did not have a charter; but the American Cotton Growers' Exchange did have a charter, and was some kind of an association. When it lost for the Government the sum of one hundred and thirty-seven or one hundred and thirty-nine million dollars—I do not remember the exact amount, but I think it was the latter—it got the Federal Farm Board to settle with it. The American Cotton Growers' Exchange and the Federal Farm Board settled all their differences, and it cost the Government in round numbers $139,000,000.

The American Cotton Growers' Exchange then got my good friend the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER]—a fine cotton Senator from the great cotton-producing State of North Dakota—to introduce a bill to do what? To disregard, to open up the compromise agreement which had been made in 1930 by which the Government lost $139,000,000, and to allow the American Cotton Growers' Exchange two items: Its cost of operation from August 1 to the close of the cotton season, and the carrying charges on cotton. Why those particular two items were selected I do not know, but they were; and, as I stated a few minutes ago, the Senator from North Dakota agreed first to an amendment to his bill leaving out cotton, and later on his bill was passed in a form which sent the claim to the Court of Claims.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I did not introduce the bill for the cotton cooperatives. The bill which I introduced was for the wheat cooperatives. Then the cotton cooperatives came in and wanted to be included in the bill, and I agreed to their inclusion, because their organization was along similar lines.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thought it was exceedingly peculiar that, although there were 30 Senators from cotton-producing States on this floor—and I am looking in the face of the chief mogul of them all, my friend from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, one of the finest men in this body—the cotton cooperatives passed them all by and got the Senator from North Dakota to introduce the bill; and the bill failed. Later on, however, they got one of the dearest friends I ever had in my life to introduce their bill, the same bill for the same claim that the Senator from North Dakota had put forward. They got my good friend from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to introduce a bill to give them about four and a quarter or four and a half million dollars—I shall refer to that bill for particulars in a few moments—on account of the cost of operation of their own business, and carrying charges of their own business, from August 1 to the close of the season.

As a matter of fact, that claim is based on this particular situation: The celebrated Farm Board were in operation at that time; and prior to October 1929 they had authorized a loan of 12 cents a pound on cotton. Cotton was then selling at about 17 cents a pound. That was the situation prior to October 21, 1929. C. O. Moser—not E. F. Creekmore, who is now presenting this claim, but C. O. Moser, I believe of Texas—wrote a five-page letter to Mr. Carl Williams, of the Farm Board, asking that the Farm Board enter an order increasing to 16 cents a pound the loan which farmers might make on cotton. It is commonly known in the history of cotton in those years as the 16-cent loan. Mr. Moser urged that the loan be made a joint affair between the Farm Board and the cooperatives. So not only Mr. Moser but a number of other gentlemen connected with the so-called cooperative movement—which is not a cooperative movement at all, but is nothing in the world but a cotton-merchant company—recommended it, and every so-called State cotton cooperative association acting under the American Cotton Cooperative Association recommended the same thing.

I have the letters here, and I will read some of them in a moment, letters in which they recommended it, and recommended it in the strongest terms. Mr. Moser, the president of the American Cotton Growers' Association, wrote such a letter. The letter was dated October 11, 1929. It took about 3 days to reach Washington. I suppose it took about 3 days more to reach Mr. Williams, the head of the Cotton Division of the Farm Board. That would make 6 days.

On October 21, 1929, 10 days after the letter was written, a day or two before all the letters from all the State organizations recommending the same thing came, the Farm Board entered an order authorizing the cooperatives and the Farm Board to use Government money to lend on cotton $80 a bale, or 16 cents a pound. The price of cotton continued to go down after that loan was made, and as it continued to go down the losses of the cotton cooperatives continued—not the present concern at all, not the American Cotton Cooperative Association, which was not then in existence, but the American Cotton Growers Exchange; they and the Government continued to sustain losses, cotton going down in price. They loaned money on 1,300,000 bales, and thereby lost $139,000,000; and a settlement was entered into later on by the cooperatives and the Government.

The purpose of the bill at this time, 10 years afterward, is to go back and rip up that agreement. Is it in order to pay the American Cotton Growers' Exchange loan, to pay those who lost or who were then in control of the cotton cooperatives? No; to pay, ostensibly, the State associations, but really the American Cotton Cooperative Association; in other words, to pay E. F. Creekmore, who controls the whole thing. He has no more of a cooperative association than has the man in the moon; he never had a cooperative association since one was formed in 1930. This is what Mr. Creekmore did. Mr. Creekmore was called by another great cotton expert, Mr. Alexander F. Legge, of Chicago, who I believe was engaged in the harvester business, or some other manufacturing business, and knew nothing about cotton. Mr. Creekmore came here. I do not know whether Mr. Creekmore and his associates, who are now making this claim on the United States Government, are sitting in the gallery or not, but they probably are. There are here, but it is not the first time Mr. Creekmore and his associates have been here asking money at the hands of the Government. They have been here constantly since 1930. On behalf of farmers? No. On behalf of cooperatives? No. But for E. F. Creekmore and company, unlimited; unlimited in their desire to get money from the Government. I propose to show now that they have engaged in this project during those 10 years; that they have committed at least seven different acts of fraud upon both the Government and upon the farmers; and I shall take those charges up in order.

I will ask Senators to remember that they are asking us to disregard their own agreement and their own settlement. Incidentally, Mr. Creekmore, who has testified a number of times—he testifies on all occasions, for Creekmore—testified that he had no legal claim against the Government. He does not make the claim that he has even an equitable claim against the Government. He says it is some sort of a moral claim. I propose to show the Senate this morning that it is one of the most immoral, dishonest, and corrupt claims that was ever made against the Government, and when I say that I do not not refer remotely or indirectly, or in any possible way, to the splendid gentleman who has introduced the bill. I have known JOHN BANKHEAD for over 50 years. He and I were schoolboys together. We were in the same class. We graduated the same year. There never was a more honest or a more correct man than JOHN BANKHEAD. But Mr. Creekmore is one of the smoothest, oiliest, eeliest men, if I may say so, who ever scuttled a ship or robbed a Congress of the United States. He is, in my judgment, utterly dishonest and corrupt. I say that because I have examined into his affairs.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. Will the Senator from Tennessee please be more specific in his charge against Mr. Creekmore with reference to fraud?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very happy to do that. I am about to proceed to it right now.

The first fraud he committed against the Government was in the way he got the money from the Government. He claims to represent farmers, mind you. Away back yonder, when he first took hold of the A. C. C. A., in some way he learned that the Shipping Board, under a provision of law—which might have been a little doubtful, although I never thought so—had been authorized to lend money to shipping companies at the lowest rate of interest the Government had ever paid for money. He needed the Government's money. He took over the remnants, the bankrupt remnants, of his own association, local and national, which went into bankruptcy in 1930, and everyone that was connected with the kind of cotton affected by the bill. The Long Staple Cotton Co., of Mississippi, did not go into bankruptcy, but it was not a member of this group, not interested one way or the other.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask the Senator to wait a moment. He asked for the specific charges of fraud, and I am going to give them to him.

First, when he came here, some lawyer advised him—I do not know who the lawyer was—or someone else advised him that that interest rate could be applied to cooperative associations. Mr. Mellon, who was Secretary of the Treasury at the time, or shortly before that time, had entered an order that the Shipping Board could get money at the lowest rate of interest the Government had paid. The Treasury Department had to borrow on short-term notes at that time, 90-day notes, or some 30-day notes, and they borrowed money at one-eighth of 1 percent, sometimes at two-eighths, or one-quarter, of a percent, sometimes at 3/8 percent. The lowest rate at which they borrowed was one-eighth of 1 percent, the highest rate was 1/8 percent, so there was a spread of from one-eighth of 1 percent to 1/8 percent.

Mr. Creekmore and his associates got the Farm Credit Association to agree that that applied to cotton cooperatives, and, under that holding and with that excuse, they borrowed the money from the Federal Government at from one-eighth of 1 percent to 1⅛ percent. Did they give it to the farmers? No; the farmers never got a thin dime out of the interest charges. What did they make out of those interest charges?

According to the record, Mr. Creekmore, with the Central Association—that is, Creekmore and company, unlimited—got 2 percent profit on their money when they lent it to their subordinates, and then their subordinates, according to the testimony, got 2 percent more. The farmers never got anything. The record shows that the amount involved was 6,000,000 bales, and the profits in interest alone were about $841,000 a year; and then the associates made a great deal because the farmers received no cheaper rates, in spite of the fact that Creekmore and his associates were getting the money from the Government for virtually nothing.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Wait a minute. The Senator has asked for proof of the charges, and I am going to give it.

Mr. ELLENDER. Before the Senator proceeds with another charge, will he not permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. ELLENDER. Who got the benefit of this $800,000 interest of which the Senator speaks?

Mr. McKELLAR. E. F. Creekmore and company, composed of the board of directors, who were the only cotton cooperatives that were ever known after Mr. Creekmore took hold of the situation. The organization had no members. It was developed in a hearing at Memphis about 5 years ago that it had no membership. It had a certain kind of membership, by the way, if it could be called such, but that membership was fraudulent.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator——

Mr. McKELLAR. Wait 1 minute. I decline to yield. The Senator from Louisiana asked me for proof of charges of fraud, and I am going to give it.

Mr. ELLENDER. But I do not think the Senator is fair in going from one charge to another unless he permits me to ask him a few questions with respect to such a charge as has been presented by him.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will give the Senator every opportunity to ask questions later.

Mr. ELLENDER. If the Senator makes assertions and charges blindly, it is rather difficult to keep up with him. Mr. President, since the Senator refuses to yield, I am not going to interrupt him any further.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I will give the Senator an opportunity to ask any questions in the world he wants to, but I am going to submit this matter to the Senate in accordance with the request of the Senator for proof of the charges.

Mr. Creekmore not only received this money——

Mr. ELLENDER. I deny that he received the money in an individual capacity.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, Mr. Creekmore swore to it. I do not know whether he——

Mr. ELLENDER. He was general manager——

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know whether he swore to the truth or not. The Senator may be right. He may not have sworn to the truth.

Mr. ELLENDER. Was he not general manager of the A. C. C. A.?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will just compose himself——

Mr. ELLENDER. I believe the Senator needs to compose himself. Was Mr. Creekmore not manager of the A. C. C. A.?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; at $75,000 a year, until Congress made him reduce his salary to $35,000 a year. I think an attempt was made to hold him down to $17,500, the amount other magnates of the country receive, but not Creekmore. He finally got about $35,000 for managing the cooperative, which was nothing in the world but a merchandising firm which Mr. Creekmore controlled entirely.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator wants to hear the facts, so please let him withhold his question for a little while.

He said the membership owned the concern. The membership never got a thin dime out of it. What happened? When the hearing was called it was desired to learn something about the membership. It was developed that the cooperative had officers but no membership. So after that whenever a bale of cotton was sold a receipt was delivered indicating that the man was a member, before the cooperative would pay him the money. Before it would pay the farmer the money for his cotton, after it had bought it from him, it made him sign a statement in connection with the waybill or the check given to him, saying that he was a member of the American Cotton Cooperative Association, or whichever one was dealing in that locality. That was a fraud.

In the Memphis hearings Mr. Creekmore was challenged to bring a list, or any list he had, of membership. He promised to do it but never did bring any list of any kind of membership. The only members were Creekmore, at the head; a man by the name of Williamson, in Louisiana, as the vice president; and then he had the heads of the various local or State cooperative associations on his board of directors, and he controlled the whole business himself, as shown by this proof. That worked very well as long as he kept borrowing the money.

Mr. President, I do not see the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] in the Chamber at the moment; later on, in connection with a shipping bill, when it was developed that the Government of the United States was lending money at one-eighth of 1 percent to the shipping companies to build ships, the Senator from Michigan brought out on the floor that the cooperatives were borrowing money at the same figure, and the Senator, as I recollect—I am having the clerk make a thorough search for the bill, and I will be able to show it a little later—introduced a bill, and it was passed, requiring all similar organizations to lend money at not exceeding 3¼ percent. That cramped Mr. Creekmore's style. He had been borrowing money at one-eighth of 1 percent up to 1⅛ percent. He did not like it. I do not know where he is.

Mr. ELLENDER. He is up in the gallery.

Mr. McKELLAR. He is up there?

Mr. ELLENDER. It is a pity that our rules will not permit him to come in and defend himself, Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. He has had every opportunity to defend himself. He has appeared before hearing after hearing and has convicted himself.

Mr. ELLENDER. Now, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will not undertake to argue, I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator made an exhaustive report, did he not, after he held the hearings in Memphis about which he spoke?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and I shall refer to it in a moment.

Mr. ELLENDER. Did not the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who was a member of that committee, file a minority report which was diametrically opposed to that made by the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes. And it was based on the same hearings.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure the Senator from Alabama will agree with me that he was present 1 day.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Two days.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, well, look at the record, Senator, and find what it shows.

Mr. ELLENDER. The record will show that the Senator from Tennessee was the only Senator present, except a day or two when the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] appeared. Is that not a fact?

Mr. McKELLAR. There is a report signed by myself and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND], the other member of the committee. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] filed a minority report. But let us not chase rabbits. I am talking about fraud; I am talking about dishonesty; I am talking about robbing the Government and robbing the farmers of the South, and I think the Senate ought to be very much more interested in that right now than in chasing rabbits.

That was the first fraud. When that bill passed, and Creekmore lost the Government pap which he had been getting for several years, he then undertook another scheme.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a minute please.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator is proceeding with another charge.

Mr. McKELLAR. I love my friend, Mr. President, but I have to decline to yield.

Mr. Creekmore came here exactly as he had done every time he was interested in getting money from the Government. He came here, and what did he do? He went to the Farm Credit Administration and got it to waive the Government's first lien on the cotton which he had, so that he could go to the New York banks and borrow money cheaper. That Government bureau was misled, and without any authority of law that I have ever been able to find, and over my earnest protest, it waived the Government's first lien on that cotton. With that waiver in his pocket, he went to New York and borrowed the money at $1^{11}/_{16}$ percent.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator, when was that transaction made?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will give it to the Senator in a minute. I will have to get it for him. I will give him the exact date.

Mr. ELLENDER. It was in 1932.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Louisiana says 1932. It was about that time. It was just after the Vandenberg bill was passed, which prohibited anyone from borrowing money from the Government for less than 3¼ percent. So Mr. Creekmore got the Farm Credit Administration to waive the Government's interest in that cotton, making it subordinate to the bank's liens, and he borrowed money at $1^{11}/_{16}$ percent. That would be $1^{65}/_{100}$ percent. What did he do? Did he divide that with the farmers? Oh, no, not a thin dime. He took 2 percent as before, and farmed the money out to the cooperative organizations, and according to the best evidence, they got 2 percent. They may have got more. That was the second fraud that this man perpetrated upon the Government, but that was not all.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator will wait.

Mr. ELLENDER. I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator interferes with my train of thought, and I want to get these facts before the Senate of the United States. It is my duty to do it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMATHERS in the chair). The Senator from Tennessee has declined to yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. McKELLAR. When that situation came to my attention I protested to the Farm Credit Administration against subordinating the Government's lien, and the Administration recognized that it had no power to do it and refused to do it.

So much for that charge of fraud.

Being deprived of the low interest, what did Mr. Creekmore do? Needing money all the time, gambling in cotton, trading in cotton just like anyone else, carrying on big operations, what did he do the third time? The third time he evolved another plan. At that time, by the way, more than half of the reorganized cooperative associations were in bankruptcy. Where are the Senators from Georgia? The Georgia local organization was in bankruptcy. The Alabama association was in bankruptcy. The Tennessee and the Arkansas organizations had been in bankruptcy but had reorganized. Where are the Senators from Oklahoma? The Oklahoma cooperative was in bankruptcy. Even the cooperative association in the State of my good friend the Senator from South Carolina, ED SMITH, was in bankruptcy. They were all in bankruptcy, with perhaps one exception, the Mid-South Association, to which I shall refer in a few moments.

What happened then? Mr. Creekmore again came to his friends in Washington. What was his scheme this time? He always had a plan. He is one of the smoothest, most ingratiating, most corrupt men ever to come to Washington—and a great many corrupt men come to Washington. What did he do then? He came here with a novel plan. He asked that the Farm Credit Administration lend $5,000,000, not to the American Cotton Cooperative Association, but to his subordinate members, more than half of whom were members of his board of directors. They were merchants, just like any other merchant. He came and asked the Farm Credit Administration to lend them $5,000,000, to be divided up among them, taking the obligations of the various cooperatives. In just a moment I shall tell the Senate how this loan was made. I have the details before me, if Senators will bear with me for just a moment. I will show how easy it is to borrow money. It is the easiest thing in the world if one has the gift of gab and is absolutely unscrupulous. There is no way in the world to prevent it.

The Alabama Cotton Cooperative Association, in bankruptcy, borrowed $400,000. Where are the Senators from Texas? The Brazos Valley Cotton Cooperative Association, which, I have been informed, was also in bankruptcy, borrowed $425,000. The California Cotton Cooperative Association—my distinguished friend from California [Mr. JOHNSON] could tell us about that, perhaps—could borrow only $175,000. The Louisiana Cooperative Association borrowed $800,000. The Mid-South Cotton Growers Association, in Arkansas and Tennessee, borrowed $800,000. I am coming to the Mid-South Association. I shall give it special attention in a few minutes. The Mississippi Cooperative Cotton Association borrowed $800,000. The Oklahoma Cotton Growers Association, which had been in bankruptcy twice, and had sold out just about the time this loan was made, borrowed $500,000. I suppose the amount in that instance was reduced about $300,000 because that organization was so freshly in bankruptcy, and so obviously had nothing. The South Carolina Association got only $200,000. Shame on you, Senator SMITH. The South Texas Association got only $200,000. The Southwest Irrigated Cotton Growers got $200,000. The West Texas Cotton Growers Association got $500,000—a total of $5,000,000.

What was done with the money? Did the associations get the money? Oh, no. One does not know Mr. Creekmore if he supposes the associations got it. They never got a thin dime of it. The $5,000,000 was borrowed in the name of the associations and then turned over to the American Cotton Cooperative Association. As I understand the stock of these insolvent concerns was put up with the Government to secure the loan. I never had a particle of doubt about the American Cotton Cooperative Association being insolvent. I protested against that loan. It was a palpable fraud. It was dishonest. It was corrupt. It was nothing more or less than stealing from the American Government.

That is the third item of fraud.

Ah, but there were some other items which made very delightful pickings for Creekmore and company, unlimited. One of them was that the Government at that time had about 6,000,000 bales of cotton in the warehouses of the country. Senators will remember how much trouble we had in selling our cotton. The farmers could not sell it. The Government could not sell it. No one could sell it. We had to put it in warehouses and lend the farmers money on it.

What happened? My heavens, the Farm Credit Administration had been given suzerainty—I cannot say sovereignty, but suzerainty, at any rate—over the cotton. So again Mr. Creekmore came to Washington. He could not bear the idea of all that cotton floating around in the South and him not getting what was coming to him out of it. What did he do? He came to Washington and got the Farm Credit Administration to do what? To "reconcentrate"—that was the big word. He got the Farm Credit Administration to reconcentrate that cotton.

What do I mean by reconcentration? Suppose there were 500,000 bales of cotton in Charleston, S. C. This is just an illustration, because I do not recall exactly how the cotton was moved each year, but the cooperative association—Mr. Creekmore and company—was authorized by the Farm Credit Administration, over whom he seemed to have a remarkable influence, to superintend the moving of the cotton. He got the Farm Credit Administration to reconcentrate the cotton—merely move it from one warehouse to another. He was to superintend the moving. For 5 years there was a constant reconcentration and moving of the cotton from one warehouse to another, out of which the American Cotton Cooperative Association drew in compensation for superintending the job the tidy little sum of about $750,000 a year. The cooperatives "cleaned up" out of moving the cotton, "reconcentrating" the cotton, moving it from one warehouse to another one year, and perhaps changing it back the next year, but moving it. I have the exact figures before me. The American Cotton Cooperative Association averaged not quite $750,000 for the years 1931, 1932, 1933, 1934, and 1935, a total of $3,700,000 for 5 years, representing charges against the cotton. That fact was testified to on page 751 of volume 2 of the record taken in the hearings.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. What did the $750,000 include?

Mr. McKELLAR. So much a bale for superintending the reconcentration.

Mr. HATCH. Did it include expenses of transportation and things of that kind?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the cotton had to bear that expense. There was a charge of so much a bale. This was lagniappe—I believe that is what it is called in Louisiana—to the American Cotton Cooperative Association.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wonder if my distinguished friend the Senator from Tennessee, can give to the Senate the name of the Government official responsible for making these loans.

Mr. McKELLAR. I cannot do so now, but I shall attempt to obtain it and give it to the Senator.

That was the fourth fraud. Think of it! Six million bales of cotton, and Mr. Creekmore got only $3,700,000 out of it. According to the testimony, the Cotton Cooperative Association got only $3,700,000 for moving the cotton. What a trial it was for the farmer. Suppose I were a farmer at Corinth, Miss., and had put three bales in the warehouse at Corinth, Miss., and borrowed money on it. I was not consulted as to whether or not it was proper to move that cotton to another warehouse. Perhaps 3 years afterward, when I wanted to sell it, I would go to the Corinth warehouse, and I would be told, "We do not have your cotton." If I asked, "Where can I get it?" I would be told, "Well, you will have to take it up with the American Cotton Cooperative Association." When the matter was taken up with the American Cotton Cooperative Association, it would be found that that particular cotton was in New Orleans. The farmer had to hunt his cotton, which had been moved from one warehouse to another, for no other reason under God's heaven than to make perquisites for the American Cotton Cooperative Association.

What comes next? That is the fourth charge. Cotton was still lying around—3,700,000 bales of it. Was not that a very "hefty" amount for the American Cotton Cooperative Association, controlled absolutely by Mr. Creekmore? That was not enough. What else did they get?

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. In a moment I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. ELLENDER. Is not the Senator now entering on the fifth charge?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; on the fifth charge.

Mr. ELLENDER. I should like to ask the Senator one question with respect to the fourth charge.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will ask me the question, I will be glad to answer it, if I can.

Mr. ELLENDER. When the A. C. C. A. handled the cotton to which the Senator has just referred, was it not done by contract entered into as the result of the association being the lowest bidder?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know how it was done. I know that Creekmore came here to the Farm Board and he went back and handled it all. I know that a distinguished gentleman from New Orleans, in the State of the Senator from Louisiana, former Governor Parker of that State, came here and testified that he had underbid the A. C. C. A., but that did not do a particle of good, and the A. C. C. A. got it just the same.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. Parker happened to be a cotton factor, and, of course, the cotton factors and merchants are against cooperatives.

Let me ask the Senator further, Is it not a fact that every transaction with reference to this cotton was supervised by the Farm Credit Administration, and its own auditors audited the books of the association?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all was that a fact. I will give an illustration from the testimony. I was trying to think of the initials of the gentleman I have in mind, though I will not give his initials, only his nickname, but he is one of the finest gentlemen we have in Memphis, "Red" Taylor. He testified that he offered to move the cotton much cheaper than did the A. C. C. A. He was a large warehouseman. He would have preferred to move it himself; as I remember his testimony, he said he would prefer to move it for nothing rather than have somebody else superintend it. The Department here turned him down cold.

Now let me go to the next charge. There were 6,000,000 bales of cotton there. My heavens, they were not going to let it get away for $3,700,000. Cotton is sold by samples. When that cotton was first put in the warehouse there was a sample pulled out of it. A sample weighs from 1 pound to a pound and a half. But when Mr. Creekmore moved the cotton he took another sample out, and when he moved it again, or when it was sold, a third sample came out of it.

The lowest estimate of a sample is a pound and the highest estimate is about 2 pounds. Let us suppose it to be a pound, and that cotton is worth 10 cents. So three samples for each bale is equivalent to 30 cents a bale for 6,000,000 bales, or the tidy little sum of $1,800,000 toll out of all this cotton, which is a sum sufficient to keep many poor farmers out of the poorhouse if they could get a few dollars of it, but they never got any part of it. That is the fifth charge.

I come to the next, and this one overtops them all. Of all the dishonest, all the mangy deals I have ever known, this takes precedence over all, and I believe everyone of the Members of the Senate will agree with me.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has taken the lead for a number of years in having passed what are known as seed-loan bills for the farmers. Seed loans are secured by the humblest farmers in the land, by poor white people who have lived on farms all their lives, by poor Negroes who have lived on farms all their lives, who are contented with very little, who are not willing to go on relief because they can work and their families can work. We established the seed-loan office, where they could borrow fifty or sixty dollars, or $80—I think the highest permitted was $200; the law did not allow them to borrow more than $200 with which to make a crop. Many of them were sharecroppers; many of them were white; many of them were colored. I could not pay them a higher compliment than the records pay them. The Seed Loan Bureau in my section of the country has collected more than 97 percent of all the money that was loaned these small farmers.

One would think that any honest man, however much he may be willing to take advantage of his fellows of a similar station in life, would keep his slimy hands off loans of this sort. Did Mr. Creekmore do it? Oh, no. You do not know Mr. Creekmore if you think he kept his slimy hands off this. What did he do? He knew exactly what to do to get the money. He came to Washington and got the Farm Credit Bureau to issue an order that every bale of cotton grown by borrowers from the Seed Loan Office should be turned over to the American Cotton Cooperatives Association for sale.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? I did not understand what he said he turned it over for?

Mr. McKELLAR. He turned it over because the Farm Credit Bureau here apparently did anything that Creekmore asked them to do. He came here and got through orders to do it. I protested at the time against it being done. I now have the facts to show the Senate.

I went to the seed-loan office in Memphis and asked them to furnish me a number of cases, running through the year 1934, illustrating the charges that were made by the so-called Cotton Cooperative Association, but, as a matter of fact, by E. F. Creekmore and company. I asked them to give me the figures of their charges and they gave them to me and a man by the name of C. G. Henry, of Memphis, formerly of Arkansas, but when they combined the Arkansas so-called cooperatives with the Tennessee cooperatives he moved to Memphis. I will discuss him in a little while. I myself put him on the stand. I presented this statement to him and he testified as to its accuracy. It is taken from his testimony in volume 1, pages 192 to 203, of the record. I desire to read how the managers of the so-called cooperative association operated and what they charged the poor, humble, poverty-stricken people who borrowed from the seed-loan office. I take actual cases. The first one is:

Loan No. 21733.
Mid-South contract No. 7603700.
Date of payment February 27, 1934.
Number of bales 1—

One—

Gross proceeds, $51.31.

Keep that figure in mind, $51.31.

Here are the deductions:

"Previous cash advance"—which was never explained, but which I propose to explain in a moment—

Previous cash advance, $5.59.
Interest on cash advance, 60 cents.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, how much was the interest?

Mr. McKELLAR. Fifty-nine cents.

Mr. ELLENDER. On how much money?

Mr. McKELLAR. On $5.59.

Mr. ELLENDER. For how long a time?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is not stated.

Interest on cash advance, 60 cents.
Insurance, $1.30.
Storage, $4.55.

Listen to this:

"Charges other than regular seasonal charges"—nobody under heaven knows what they were—"$1.40."

Ah, but that is not all:

Membership fee in the American Cotton Cooperative Association, or in the local association, $5.

A $5 membership fee because the man had to sell his cotton through this feeding concern.

Association news subscription: They got out a newspaper at the expense of the Government; and this poor colored farmer—this happened to be a colored man—was charged 50 cents for that. I do not know whether he could read or not. I doubt if he ever read the newspaper if he could read. There was nothing in it that any decent man would ever undertake to read. That made 50 cents more.

Interest on cash paid out for freight, storage, etc., 40 cents.

Or a total of $19.34.

Well, you might say that if cash was advanced to this colored man it would be proper to take that out; but do you notice that there is not an item for commission? There is not an item for commission, and my own judgment is that they did not want to put in "commission" because that would look bad, so they just charged the farmer with "cash advanced" for their commission; and they charged him 51 cents interest on the commission because they did not get it soon enough.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a minute. In all, these items aggregated $19.34 to be taken out of a $51.31 bale of cotton.

Here are 49 bales of cotton taken at random. All these charges were admitted except the $5.59 for cash advanced and interest. No commission was charged, as you will see. The idea of advancing a man $5 on a bale of cotton when it was turned over. Why, it is the most improbable thing in the world. They certainly were entitled to a commission, and in my judgment the commission was covered up in this $5.59.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point the table to which I have been referring, and the act of February 2, 1931, with reference to interest rates on loans, and so forth.

There being no objection, the table and act were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Public—No. 603—71st Cong.—H. R. 7998]

An act to amend subsection (d) of section 11 of the Merchant Marine Act of June 5, 1920, as amended by section 301 of the Merchant Marine Act of May 22, 1928

Be it enacted, etc., That subsection (d) of section 11 of the Merchant Marine Act of June 5, 1920, as amended by section 301 of the Merchant Marine Act of May 22, 1928 (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 871; 45 Stat. L., pt. 1, p. 691), is amended to read as follows:

"(d) All such loans shall bear interest at rates as follows, payable not less frequently than annually: During any period in which the vessel is operated exclusively in coastwise trade, or is inactive, the rate of interest shall be as fixed by the Board, but not less than 5¼ percent per annum. During the period in which a vessel is being constructed, equipped, reconditioned, remodeled, or improved; and/or during any period in which such a vessel is operated in foreign trade, the rate shall be as fixed by the Board, but provided, however, that on all contracts hereinafter entered into the interest rate shall be not less than 3½ percent per annum. The lowest rate of interest shall not be granted for the construction, equipment, reconditioning, remodeling, or improvement of any vessel for the foreign trade unless it is contracted that such vessel upon completion shall not be operated exclusively and under enrollment in the coastwise and/or intercoastal trade for more than 3 months in any calendar year; and if such vessel shall be operated exclusively and under enrollment in such trades for more than 3 months in any calendar year, the Board shall collect the difference between the low rate of interest charged and 5¼ percent per annum during the period of construction, equipment, reconditioning, remodeling, or improvement. The Board may prescribe rules for determining the amount of interest payable under the provisions of this paragraph."

Approved, February 2, 1931.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now yield to the Senator from Louisiana, because I want a minute to myself in a moment.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the able Senator inform us whether or not the association was supposed to collect from this farmer the money for the seed?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no idea. I am talking about cotton, not about seed.

Mr. ELLENDER. What was the interest charge? I am just wondering if it was for money advanced.

The reason why I ask the question is that under date of June 7, 1938, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and I made a report from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, pursuant to Senate Resolutions 137 and 205, and our committee went into the question of seed loans——

Mr. McKELLAR. I see that the Senator from Louisiana is trying to make a speech in my time. I hope he will not do that. Will not the Senator be good enough to defer his remarks until he has the floor in his own right? I like the Senator from Louisiana; I am very fond of him, but will he not let me continue my argument, and then make his own? If the Senator desires to ask a question, I shall be glad to answer it; but, he is making an argument, and I do not want him to do that in my time.

Mr. President, I want to say one thing: The French have a word which describes the sort of fraud that has been committed by Mr. Creekmore and his company. I do not think Albert B. Fall, who took a bribe of $100,000 for the sale of oil lands, committed a greater wrong than Mr. Creekmore has committed against the farmers of the Nation and against the Government of the United States. The amount involved, in the case of Mr. Creekmore, is a great deal larger. He has had the handling of over $200,000,000 which the Government has lost under his management and control; and yet, after all these frauds have been committed, both upon the farmer and upon the Government, he now comes back here asking to open his acccunts of 10 years ago to get carrying charges and cost of operation from August 1 to the close of the cotton season.

Mr. President, I am intensely interested in this matter, though I have no other interest in it than that of a citizen of the United States and an honest man. It seems to me that if there is in hades one place deeper than another, it should be reserved for a man who will rob under this guise a lowly, hard-working southern farmer, whether white or colored, by deducting from the price of his cotton subscription price of a so-called newspaper that was no newspaper, by deducting a $5 admission fee into the cooperatives, and deducting from the poor devil's cotton these other undisclosed sums; and I do not see how any Senator can vote for a bill of this kind.

I now come to the bill itself for just a moment, to show you what it means. Let me call attention of the Senate to the bill. It is supposed to be a farmers' bill, and has been reported out of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. As a matter of fact, it is not a farmers' bill at all. It is a claim bill pure and simple. It provides for the payment of an immoral and an unjust and a dishonest claim against the Government. These people have a claim of four and a half million dollars for the expenses of running their business from August 1 until the close of the season; and do you know what they did with this cotton? Will Senators listen for just a moment to what they did with it? They got 1,300,000 bales of cotton under the 16-cent loan. They sold on the spot market 800,000 bales and bought futures in their place—gambling with this very cotton; no carrying charges—and yet they come here and make a claim for carrying charges and for operating costs for the 1,300,000 bales. If this were an honest claim, it could not be more than five-thirteenths of what they allege; but I say it is a dishonest claim. And why do I say it? Does the bill propose to pay the farmers anything? I ask the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], who are members of the committee which reported out this bill, is a dime of this money to be paid to farmers?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I yield. I asked the Senator a question, and I wish to yield to him.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The bill shows on its face that it is to pay cotton cooperatives in various States listed in the bill. It is not even to pay the American Cotton Cooperative Association, as the Senator from Tennesseee has been arguing, but to pay the State cooperatives; and, of course, the cooperative is the property of the farmers. It is their agency and instrumentality for doing the work of marketing cotton.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I challenge the Senator from Alabama to show that a single farmer not included in the officials of the association ever got a thin dime of profit out of this particular cooperative association. On the contrary, I sent a telegram to Memphis, where the most prosperous of all the cooperatives is located. I saw Mr. Henry in the gallery here the other day, ready to use this money to pay those debts. He has never paid them. The debts I last mentioned have never been paid. The $400,000 and the $800,000 debts, all of which were turned over to the American Cotton Cooperative Association, have never been paid; and I could see on his face that he was looking forward to the time when Congress would appropriate this money, and he could pay those debts and divide up the balance between the cooperatives—not between the farmers. I will tell you why.

A short time ago, when most of the cotton dealers in my section of the country were in bankruptcy, or nearly bankrupt, I noticed on the corner of Monroe and Front Streets, two of the principal streets in my city of Memphis, a magnificent building of stone, as I recall it, being erected, and I was told the Mid-South Cooperative Association was erecting that building—a great office building—one of the best in our city. I telegraphed this morning to ascertain whether there was any encumbrance on it, and in whose name it stood. It stands in no farmer's name; it stands in the name of the Mid-South Association, and there is no encumbrance on it. Mr. Henry owes the Government right now $800,000, and has not paid any of it, and is waiting for Creekmore to get this bill through, to use the money for the purpose of paying the debt he owes the Government, representing money which should never have been loaned to him at all. But I understand that his association is better off than any of the others. Many of the others are in bankruptcy. I have no doubt that if they paid their honest debts the American Cotton Cooperative Association and every one of its affiliates would be in bankruptcy this very minute, and that is why they are here. They have come to the Government time after time. They came first when they could get money from the Government at one-eighth or one-quarter of 1 percent. They came next when they could get the Government to waive its right to priority. Third, when the association came here to borrow money; then again when it got permission to move the cotton from one place to another at practically no cost but tremendous profit; fifth, when they sampled the cotton; and, lastly, when they took as expenses and charges about two-thirds of the poor farmers' cotton, which they actually handled individually.

Let me read the bill—not all of it but part of it. Mind you, none of these men are members of the American Cotton Growers Exchange; they are members of the American Cotton Cooperative Association, if they are members of anything. Among the payments provided for is the following:

Four hundred and nineteen thousand five hundred and ninety-one dollars and seventeen cents, Alabama Cotton Cooperative Association, successor to Alabama Farm Bureau Cotton Association.

That association went into bankruptcy. They are not going to pay the money to an association in bankruptcy. Farmers who compose the American Cotton Growers' Association had to go into bankruptcy, and, of course, they are not considered by Mr. Creekmore any further.

All the various beneficiaries are set out. The four million and a half is divided up, but there is a surplus. Where does that go? Listen to the following provision in a so-called farmers' bill. Farmers, my eye!

SEC. 6. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,512,068.07 to be available to the Farm Credit Administration to make the payments authorized and directed by this act.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have an amendment which will be offered, when the bill is taken up, to substitute for the language the Senator has read, the following:

The payments authorized to be made by the Farm Credit Administration under this act shall be made from the revolving fund established pursuant to section 6 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act as amended, and so much of such fund as may be necessary for the purpose of making such payments is hereby made available for such purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the amendment is more involved than the other language.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Under section 5 of the bill, what is the privity between the old association and those who are described as members who would "otherwise be entitled under this act shall be paid to the cotton cooperative association now doing business in said State"?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I am perfectly willing to have the Senator from Alabama explain it first. I have an explanation of it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am sure the Senator from Wyoming is familiar with the cooperative program.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Yes, and I want to know the privity between the old association and the present one.

Mr. BANKHEAD. They continued an old association. New members came and old ones went. This is for the payment of the cooperative itself, not the members. The cooperative is continuing along from time to time.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Wyoming will yield a moment so that I may ask the Senator from Alabama a question, It is not claimed, is it, that any of this money is to go direct to farmers?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I stated a while ago that it went to the cooperatives.

Mr. McKELLAR. To the cooperatives, but not to the farmers.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Indirectly to the farmers, all of it, because they own the cooperatives——

Mr. McKELLAR. Not a single cent——

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Senator is not going to let me answer, is going to drown me out, I will ask him not to ask me a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am merely telling the Senator that the farmers themselves have not gotten a cent out of these cooperatives. Now, I ask the Senator from Wyoming for his question.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. I merely wanted to get the matter clear in my mind. I assume that the original associations went into bankruptcy.

Mr. McKELLAR. They did.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Were their affairs closed up?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; many of them are in the hands of receivers, through Federal courts. For instance, the Georgia organization was closed up in the courts, and practically all of them are closed up in the courts. Either that, or they were sold out and bought by the officers of the cooperatives.

Let me explain to the Senator, these losses occurred, not during the life of the American Cotton Cooperatives Association, but before it was organized. The losses they claim were made by the American Cotton Growers Association, and the cotton cooperatives came about 6 or 8 months later, and took up the remains and followed on. There was never any transfer. They merely took the same officers in the State. The Senator must remember that there are no cooperatives, in the true sense of the word, in this whole organization. It is merely a lot of officers. They took the officers from the Georgia association and created another one. They took the officers, not the association, and they did likewise in Tennessee and Arkansas. In Mississippi they let the old one go, and those who were connected with it started another one. They are a new regime. If this case were in a court the first thing I would do would be to move to dismiss because they have no possible legal or moral claim because of the frauds they have perpetrated upon the Government and upon the farmers. But, aside from that, there is no connection between the old organizations and the new except that they were established in the same States, and in many cases Mr. Creekmore merely took some of the men connected with the old institution, and started a new one in each State. That is the whole story.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Without considering at all the merits of the bill, I assume that the original associations had a moral or legal right to receive what is here given to recompense for losses, then I should like to know under what rule of law or any other rule that right passed on to the present association.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is correct; there is no rule of law by which the right could be passed on to the other association, because there was no connection between them except that Creekmore took the remnants of the old ones and built new ones around them where he could; and Mr. Creekmore is a very smart, a very able man. He is a very crafty man, as I have said, and, in my judgment, a very dishonest and corrupt man. I know that from having examined into his affairs; and I have been examining witnesses for many years and I think I know a dishonest man when I run across one.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. Since the Senator has had so many dealings with Mr. Creekmore and in his judgment found him dishonest, has he ever made any criminal charge against him?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have discussed this matter time and again on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. ELLENDER. Persons guilty of such charges as the Senator makes should not be permitted to be at large.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator would look at the hearings which have been held——

Mr. ELLENDER. I have read all of the hearings, and in my opinion they are not responsive to the charges preferred by the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. He would find all kinds of charges.

Mr. ELLENDER. I may further state that I read the hearings on Senate Resolutions 103, 125, 172, and 182, Seventy-fourth Congress, held by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and of course those in which I participated with respect to Senate Resolutions 137 and 205, Seventy-fifth Congress, and all the charges which the Senator is now urging before the Senate were ventilated and the committee found no basis for the charges preferred by the able Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Talk about hearings. I have before me a report known as Report No. 1819, Seventy-fourth Congress, second session, and virtually every charge I have made on the floor today was made in that report, in substance, one way or another.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. As I pointed out awhile ago, is it not a fact that the minority report filed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] contradicts the report of the Senator from Tennessee, and both reports are based on the same hearings?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator takes it that way, it may be. The Senator from Alabama appeared once, as I recall, although he says he appeared twice, and I take his word for it, because he is a perfectly honest and straightforward man and would not mislead anyone for the world. But it seems to me he has too much confidence in the honesty and integrity of some people who come in contact with him, and I think the Senator from Louisiana stands in the same category. That is just my judgment about it.

Mr. ELLENDER. The minority report of the Senator from Alabama shows that he did read the record. I want to say, further, if the Senator will permit me, that we held hearings pursuant to resolutions 137 and 203, Seventy-fifth Congress, as I have previously indicated, on the same questions raised, and the entire Committee on Agriculture and Forestry seems to be in disagreement with the position of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. How many members of the Committee on Agriculture were present when the pending bill was reported out?

Mr. ELLENDER. I do not know, but I am confident there was a quorum present.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sorry to hear that, because if they had understood the facts I am quite sure they never would have reported it out.

Mr. President, at this time I shall yield the floor, and leave to other Senators the discussion of this matter, and I shall hereafter reply to any arguments or suggestions that may be made.

Before I take my seat I wish to say that I cannot conceive how it is possible for the Senate to pass the bill in the face of these flagrant frauds on the part of Creekmore, the head of the organization, running over a period of 10 years. First, he undertook, by way of a technicality, to borrow money at cheap rates, and then defraud the farmers by withholding from them the benefit of those cheap rates. Later he came before the Farm Credit Administration Bureau and had the Government's first liens waived on this cotton so he could borrow money in New York at 1½ percent, but he never shared that advantage with the farmers at all, but took the benefits to himself, and gave part of them to his colaborers in the so-called cooperatives. He chiseled the farmers, with the consent of the Bureau here, out of $3,700,000 for overseeing the changing of cotton from one warehouse to another, the income from that source during a period of 5 years aggregating over $700,000 a year. He sampled the cotton, at a rate of 30 cents a bale at the lowest, the charge in connection with 6,000,000 bales amounting to $1,800,000. Then he swindled the farmers by charging them $5 for admission to a cooperative which never existed, and charging 50 cents a subscription for a newspaper which no one ever read. With all those charges made against him, it is impossible for me to see any equity in the measure. It is immoral; it is unjust; it is dishonest; it is rotten to the last degree, and I hope the Senate will vote it down.

Mr. President, this would ordinarily be considered as a private claim. It is not a claim on the part of farmers. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has admitted that the farmers did not get anything out of it, but these cooperatives got a part of the four and a half million dollars. Why should the Senate of the United States pass such a bill? The bill has never been before the Committee on Claims. I hope the bill will be withdrawn. It ought to be withdrawn. It ought not to go any further. If it is not withdrawn, however, I shall move to refer it to the Committee on Claims, and let that committee look into these things and pass judgment on them.

If that is not done, then I shall move to do what the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] did with respect to the wheat growers. I shall move to send the claim to the Court of Claims and let it pass on the matter. That is the tribunal which we have created to pass on such claims as this, and all other claims, good or bad. If any man has an honest claim, he is willing to submit it to a court. Why come here snooping around, lobbying around this body, and afterward in the House of Representatives, to get through Congress what, in my judgment, is a dishonest and a corrupt claim?

Mr. President, I have no personal interest in this matter. I have been fighting this band of racketeers for a number of years. I fought them when it was very unpopular to fight them in my State, because in the early days of the State cooperatives the farmers thought they were the top of the world, that they were helping them, but they have since come to know that the cotton cooperatives have not helped them at all.

Mr. President, I hope my good friend, my splendid, honest friend in the highest degree, who has taken an active hand in connection with this bill, will withdraw it. Turn the rascals out. Someone said they, dishonest and corrupt, are now in the gallery of the greatest lawmaking body, trying to obtain this money, after defrauding the Government of hundreds of thousands of dollars, trying to defraud it of four and a half million dollars more.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD obtained the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to call attention to one other matter, and that is the report of the committee in this case. It is quite remarkable that the Farm Credit Administration has not recommended the passage of the bill. They say in their report that it is a matter for Congress, and that Congress should do whatever it desires to do. They simply presented the figures in connection with the matter, but they have passed no judgment on it. That is the first thing. Then, to the honor of the chairman of the committee who reported the measure, let it be said that in his report he made the following statement:

> The action of your committee was based primarily on the information contained in reports submitted by the Farm Credit Administration, which are set forth below.

The Farm Credit Administration refuses to recommend the bill. The committee says it reports the bill to the Senate based on the statement made by the Farm Credit Administration.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Barkley	Byrd	Clark, Idaho
Ashurst	Bilbo	Byrnes	Danaher

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the question now pending is the motion by the majority leader, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], to take up Senate bill 2585 for consideration. I do not think it advisable or necessary on that motion to enter upon a detailed discussion of the merits of the bill. That will come in due course.

A bill along this line has been pending, off and on, for a number of years. It is, of course, known and admitted by the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] that from time to time efforts have been made by the cooperatives to obtain an adjustment of the claim involved in the bill. A bill for the purpose was introduced in 1938, I believe, by the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] has stated that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] introduced a cotton bill. He has stated that the cotton people went to the Senator from North Dakota to persuade him to introduce such a bill. That statement is not in line with the record, Mr. President. The Senator from North Dakota introduced a bill relating to wheat. It went to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and during its consideration before that committee, Senators on the committee included cotton. The cotton growers did not go to the Senator from North Dakota to persuade him to introduce the bill, but as the Senator from South Carolina well knows, cotton was included at the instance of members of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By reason of the very strenuous opposition of the Senator from Tennessee, that bill did not come to final action by the Senate. Last year, because of the absence for most of the year of the Senator from South Carolina, due to illness in his family, I agreed to introduce the bill for the cooperatives. Since last year the bill has been on the calendar. The committee conducted long and full hearings on the bill, and favorably reported it. Weeks and weeks ago the majority leader assured the proponents of the measure that so far as he could control the procedure, the bill would be given the right-of-way after the Hatch bill and the reciprocal trade agreements measure had been disposed of.

The simple question is whether the motion to take up the bill, which has been made by the majority leader, in conformity with the regular and orderly procedure, shall be voted down and the bill left suspended on the calendar as it will be in that event, or whether the motion shall be adopted. I have never before really known of a contest on a motion made by the majority leader merely to take up a measure on the calendar for consideration. So, without going into the merits of the bill, I think it is fair to those interested in the measure, to a large number of its supporters in the Senate, who know much about this transaction and are familiar with it, and it is fair to the cooperatives to let the bill come before the Senate and be considered and finally acted on.

With that statement, Mr. President, I am ready to take a vote on the pending motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2585. [Putting the question.]

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2585) to reimburse the cotton cooperative associations for losses occasioned by the Federal Farm Board's stabilization operations, and for other purposes.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Is this the proper time to move to refer the bill to the Committee on Claims? It is a private claims bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that a motion to refer the bill to the Claims Committee would be in order.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Then I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Claims, and I desire to argue that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, it will be recalled that when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] had pending a bill to reimburse the wheat cooperatives for similar charges he included the cotton cooperatives. Finally, when that bill was passed, the whole matter was referred to the Court of Claims. Perhaps this bill ought to take the same course; certainly it should not take any lesser course. The Senator from Nebraska is the chairman of the Committee on Claims, and——

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I will yield in a moment. The Committee on Claims has jurisdiction of all claims. I was told by the parliamentarian, Mr. Watkins, that this bill ought to have been referred to the Claims Committee in the first instance. I think it ought to be referred there now, and that is why I have made the motion. I now yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. As I understood, the Senator moved to refer the bill to the Committee on Claims, but he mentioned also referring it to the Court of Claims.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The two, of course, are not at all the same; but the rules of the Senate permit at all times a motion to refer to the Court of Claims any private claim against the Government; and it may become necessary to make such a motion. That was the course that was taken in regard to the wheat-cooperatives measure, and I see no reason why we should make fish of one and fowl of the other. So I am perfectly willing that this measure be referred to the Committee on Claims. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry did not properly have jurisdiction of this bill. There is no farm matter connected with it; it is a private claim by a cotton merchandising firm for four and a half million dollars, which is a very large amount. It seems to me that the measure might well be referred to the Committee on Claims, where all such private claims go. If I had been present at the time the bill was introduced, I would have asked that it be referred to that committee; but it seems I was not present at the time, and therefore such a motion was not made.

I asked the Parliamentarian, Mr. Watkins, a day or two ago about it, and he said that the proper reference was to the Committee on Claims, as I understood him at that time. I also think the bill ought to go to the Committee on Claims. I do not believe this matter ought to be disposed of in the way proposed. It embraces a very important matter. The evidence is very lengthy; it requires a most careful examination; it ought to be examined by a court; but the reason the cooperatives do not want it to go to the Court of Claims is that they admit, at the very outset, that they have no legal claim against the Government.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I have been a member of the Committee on Claims since I have been in the Senate. When I first came I thought that all bills which involved claims had to go to the Committee on Claims. During the first year I was here the Committee on Claims passed on certain types of bills and rejected them. Then, much to my astonishment, the next year the bills were reintroduced and referred to another committee which reported them favorably. I thought that was wrong, and I protested against it, but my protest did not do very much good. I have not found that the fact that a bill should naturally go to one committee would prevent it going to another committee, and I have repeatedly seen bills involving claims which I thought should have gone to the Committee on Claims go to other committees, and then seen them reported by those committees and passed by the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. I cannot give the history, but I can give the Senator the experience I have had with this bill. I know that all private claims go to the Claims Committee. This is a private claim. This is a claim for the payment of money by the Government on some kind of moral ground. In my opinion, it is an immoral claim. I think it is a very immoral and a very dishonest and a very corrupt claim, and I think the Committee on Claims, before the Senate acts on it, should be required to go into the matter and report to the Senate. I am more inclined than ever to that opinion when I read the report of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, which states that they based their report on the facts as coming from the Department. The Department makes no recommendation about this matter. The Department knows that this is a dishonest claim; it knows perfectly well that if it had been an honest claim the Department would have recommended it. If it were an honest claim, every Senator would recommend it. Whether on moral or legal grounds, if it were a good, honest, moral claim, this body would properly pass it beyond any doubt, in my judgment. But this is a dishonest and corrupt and immoral claim against the Government. It is a travesty upon justice, and I think before we act on it it ought to go to the Committee on Claims. I have asked that the Parliamentarian, to whom I first submitted the matter, be sent for—he does not seem to be present at the moment—and as soon as he is here I will ask the Chair——

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. What is the status in regard to this bill? Has the Senator moved to recommit the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee has made a motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McKELLAR. I move to refer the bill to the Claims Committee, which has jurisdiction of the matter. It was reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Tennessee is the question before the Senate.

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BILBO. I do not know what disposition will be made of the Senator's motion to refer the bill to the Claims Committee, but, before the motion shall be disposed of, I ask that an amendment which I have be read. I think the Senator from Alabama, who is the author of the bill, will accept the amendment. I do not think the Senator from Tennessee will object to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Mississippi will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, line 16, after the semicolon, it is proposed to insert:

$93,373.15, Staple Cotton Cooperative Association, Mississippi.

And on page 6, to strike out lines 8 to 12, inclusive, and in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 6. The payments authorized to be made by the Farm Credit Administration under this act shall be made from the revolving fund established pursuant to section 6 of the Agricultural Marketing Act, as amended; and so much of such fund as may be necessary for the purpose of making such payments is hereby made available for such purpose.

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. BILBO. The Staple Cooperative Association——

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the Long Staple Cooperative Association.

Mr. BILBO. Yes; they were a separate unit, operating in a different way; but they suffered the same fatalities under the operations of the old Farm Board as the short-staple people did, and if one claim is just the other is just.

Mr. McKELLAR. Did not all the farmers of the country suffer in exactly the same way?

Mr. BILBO. All of them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Every cotton farmer.

Mr. BILBO. All of us who were involved in the cooperatives; yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. All whether they were involved in the cooperatives or not. They suffered from the conditions brought about by the cooperatives and the Government in 1929–30. All the farmers did.

Now may I proceed for a few moments?

Mr. BILBO. The point I am making is that if the claim of the cooperatives involved in the bill introduced by the Senator from Alabama is just, and they are entitled to relief, most certainly the long-staple people, who suffered as a result of the same act on the same ground, are entitled to it. I am sure the Senator will not object to my amendment going along with the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all.

Mr. BILBO. Very well. Now, I ask the Senator from Alabama if he will not accept my amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to accept it. I have here a letter from Governor Black stating that the claim has been audited, and that the amount is correctly shown; but he did not recommend it, as he did not recommend the others, because he thought that was a question of national policy to be settled by Congress. I think this matter occupies the same status as the other.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am very happy that the Senator from Mississippi has brought forward that claim. It shows how ridiculous all these claims are. If the cooperatives—the A. C. C. A. and those under them—are entitled to receive a gift from the Government, of course the long-staple cooperatives of Mississippi or any other cotton cooperatives of any kind, nature, or description, or any other farmers who lost by reason of the transaction, are entitled to it. I see no distinction. The present companies, the subsidiaries of the A. C. C. A., are no more entitled to it than are the Mississippi long-staple cooperatives, which had nothing to do with it, and the present concerns had nothing to do with it either. It was lost by subsidiaries of the old American Cotton Growers' Exchange. So, if one cooperative is entitled to it, another cooperative is entitled to it. I say that none of them are entitled to it. It is merely a matter of a gift primarily to a number of dishonest and corrupt men who are profiteering at the expense of the Government.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin will state the point of order.

Mr. WILEY. I desire to know if at this time the presentation of amendments is in order under the motion.

Mr. BILBO. No, sir; it is not. I was asking the Senator from Alabama if he would accept the amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was done by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Tennessee is the question before the Senate, and it takes precedence over any amendment at this time. The Senator from Tennessee yielded to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. BILBO. I ask that the amendment go with the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been presented by the Senator from Mississippi, and has been read for the information of the Senate. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, by unanimous consent the amendment may be accepted. The Senate may do anything by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has a different opinion from the Senator from Mississippi on that point until the pending motion is disposed of.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will not concent to it at this time; but the Senator may brings up the amendment later on. I think, as a matter of fact, the claim of the Mississippi Cotton Growers' Association is probably the cleanest claim that has been made by any such association.

Mr. BILBO. They are very fine people.

Mr. McKELLAR. They have been honest. The other associations have not any members. The Mississippi association has some members. Why do I say the others have not any members?

Mr. BARKLEY. They have character.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; they have not character either. They are utterly destitute of character. The reason why I say that the Mississippi association is more deserving than the others is that it has some members. The others have not any members. When Mr. Creekmore was before the committee at Memphis, I challenge him to produce any members that he has, and he never produced one. He said he was going to do it, but he never produced any members except the officers of the association.

Now I ask unanimous consent to ask the Senator from Alabama a question. Is he not willing to submit this case to the Court of Claims?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, that is simply the request of a special pleader.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; I am not pleading for anything.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, yes. The Senator knows that this claim has been pending here not only during the last Congress but during all of this Congress, and that it has been before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry—which has handled all these matters—without heretofore being challenged, and that full hearings were had before the committee, and the claim has had thorough and full consideration. The Senator knows that the cotton shippers of his city had a representative here who appeared before the committee and not only testified but asked questions, and put into the record everything they wanted to put in. So the whole matter has had open and fair and full consideration by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I do not see any reason at this time to start all over again with a different committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator asked me a question. In fairness, let me get through answering it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well, go ahead.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator knew that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was considering this claim. He knew it because this man from Memphis was around his office. He knew that the whole hearing was going on there. He did not make any objection at the time. He did not come in and make any motion to recommit the bill. He took chances, I assume, on what the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry would find.

Mr. McKELLAR. There never was a chance about that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Now, after the hearings have been completed, and the bill has been on the calendar for nearly a year, we are confronted with this motion, which I think is entirely unreasonable.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator from Alabama is not willing to submit this claim to the Claims Committee. The reason why I say that is that this claim has been turned down not once but several times by the Senate. It was brought up time and again while the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] had charge of the bill, and finally it was omitted. The Senator from North Dakota gave it up and let it go, after years of struggle. The Senator from Alabama knows that this bill was reported on the 19th of last July, and has come up on the calendar time and again, and every time it has been objected to by me. Of course, it has been objected to by me. I know what the facts are. I know how dishonest and corrupt this claim is, and I have objected to it every time, and I shall continue to object to it.

I think the fair thing to do is to let the claim go to the Committee on Claims at this time. I submit the motion for a vote, and ask for the yeas and nays. Let us have the yeas and nays. May we have them?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are requested. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator from Tennessee has taken occasion to discuss the character of the men who have charge of this matter. Of course, he believes what he has stated about them; but this matter is not in the nature of a private claim. It is an adjustment of what, in my opinion, is a fair and just payment by the Government for the agents who worked for it in an emergency.

I have before me a statement from Mr. Legge and Mr. Stone to the effect that when the Farm Board was in operation they assumed the responsibility of saying to the cooperatives and to the cotton growers, regardless of whether or not they were members of a cooperative association, that they could get a loan of 16 cents a pound. Of course, they wanted someone who would take charge of assembling the cotton and handing out the loan. They chose the cooperatives, which all of us have been sedulously trying to establish throughout the farming area, not only in the case of cotton but in the case of all other staple farm crops. They have been mercilessly and bitterly fought by those who were in the business of buying and selling agricultural products. The history of that fight might interest the Senate, but that does not pertain to this particular case.

The cooperatives, those of my State included, assumed the agency for the Farm Board to lend this 16 cents a pound.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, did they not go into bankruptcy in the Senator's State?

Mr. SMITH. I am not talking about bankruptcy or any other "ruptcy." [Laughter.] I am talking about what the Farm Board, an agent of the Government, did. Now, mark you, the national organization of which Mr. Creekmore is the head, was not then formed.

Mr. McKELLAR. No.

Mr. SMITH. And in my time I will read the statements from the Farm Board and from the Department. They met and agreed that the losses sustained by the cooperatives in their expense accounts were legal and just, and the Farm Board officials met and agreed on a settlement. The Attorney General said that they had no legal right; that is, that there was no specific statute which warranted them in paying their agents for the losses sustained by the agents in assembling the cotton, and it was suggested that it would take a legislative act to do justice to the agents who had acted for the Farm Board. If necessary, I shall read more or less the history of this transaction.

Mr. Stone and Mr. Legge talked to me about the matter. Mr. Stone particularly said that this was a just claim, but was not stipulated in any contract and, therefore, he could not justify the payment of it as legal.

I think that the Committee on Claims have no right in this matter, in that it involves what we are to do with what we have spent two-thirds of the time since I have been a Member of the Senate in trying to build up, namely a reasonable, practical, efficient cooperative program amongst the farmers. Only those who have taken occasion to study the proposition know the difficulties which are encountered. Those attempting to accomplish this object are handicapped by two almost insuperable difficulties. First, there is the ignorance of the average producer as to what cooperation means. There must be a slow educational process. On the other hand, cooperatives are fought by a virulent, powerful organization of those known as buyers and speculators. I think it can be substantiated that Memphis, Tenn., raised $100,000 to fight cooperatives. That was the object. If the cooperatives succeeded they might take away a very rich field of pickings.

This matter was before our committee. We had the original Farm Board law before us, which I want to say, in passing was one of the best ever enacted, and the reason for its failure to succeed was that the speculators determined to destroy it. There must be an educational process.

The committee have gone into all the facts, and I do not believe there is a more honest or just claim on the Federal Government than that involving the reimbursment of its agents, who spent their reserves, and who occupied the relation of responsible agents to an arm of the Government.

The 16-cent loan kept the market at 16 cents or above until 89 percent of that year's crop was sold. The cooperatives gathered the cotton, loaned the money, spent their time, and now they are supposed to pay the warehouse charges, the grading and stapling charges, and all the charges incident to handling, millions of bales of cotton, as agents acting for the Farm Board.

I think it is up to this body to decide whether we will, in good faith, reimburse the agents of the Farm Board. I will not refer to anything else until my time comes to make my statement about the matter.

It does not make any difference to me whether those who are engaged in this activity are as pure as angels or as corrupt as the devil, the thing for us to decide is our duty in the matter. Are we justified in reimbursing the agents of an arm of the Government for doing the things they were asked to do. I do not care who instigated the Farm Board, they say, officially, "We assume the responsibility of being the initiators of the 16-cent loan."

Mr. President, no one can calculate the benefit of that loan to the cotton growers. After 89 percent of the cotton crop was disposed of, cotton went down to about 13 cents a pound, which meant a difference of $15 a bale. That would have occurred had not this loan been extended through the cooperative organizations. They might have gotten someone else to do it. It seems to me the question for us to decide is whether we are going to meet what, in my opinion, in this particular case is an honest obligation of the Government to reimburse those who in good faith did the job for the Farm Board. That is all that is involved.

As to the other transactions, I spent my vacations for 6 years trying to organize cooperative associations. I knew what we were up against—ignorance on the part of the farmers as to the workings of cooperatives and the desire and the determination on the part of those who buy and sell the farmers' crops to show that the Government had no right to come in and try to support, to place on its feet and set to work some kind of resistance to the almost insuperable power of the few who were organized, as those who deal in the market are.

I think this particular debt on the part of the Federal Government to reimburse these people for what they spent is one which should be met. They acted whether they were bankrupt or not. Every cooperative in the South was the agent of the Farm Board to get the cotton and to see that a loan was obtained. Then when the settlement came they were denied reimbursement for the expenses they incurred in bringing about the salvation of the cotton farmer at that particular time.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to refer this bill to the Committee on Claims, as though it were some drummed-up claim on the part of certain individuals, will be defeated. It is acknowledged by the Farm Board, by the Farm Credit Administration, as being a just obligation to those who did the work and incurred the expense, some of whom who have not organized are now bankrupt.

I would not like to see the Senate go back on the effort to organize those who offer the least resistance among all those in the productive area of organized society. No defense? Every man here knows there is not a cotton grower or a wheat grower who ever sold a bushel of wheat or a pound of cotton at a price he could establish. He simply produced it and delivered it. Others fixed the price.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to ask the Senator if he thinks there is any difference between our treatment of the wheat cooperatives and of the cotton cooperatives?

Mr. SMITH. I think the different sections of the country will answer the Senator's question. The Senator comes from a cotton-growing region, and he knows we have had one devil of a time getting anything. It is not so in connection with other political areas.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will merely say to the Senator that wheat and cotton went together at first, and then the measure presented by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] was referred to the Court of Claims. Why should not this claim be referred to the Court of Claims?

Mr. SMITH. Because it is a different character of claim entirely.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. The statement of the Senator from Tennessee is not quite correct. The bill was not referred to the Court of Claims. The bill was passed here, and then the wheat cooperatives had to go into the Court of Claims and establish their claim against the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is what I said. And has not the court decided against the claim? I read an article in the newspaper a day or two ago stating that the court had held against the claim.

Mr. FRAZIER. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. What did the court hold? That information can easily be obtained.

Mr. FRAZIER. The court held that the cooperatives were out so much money by reason of the action of the Farm Credit Administration; that they had lost that much money through their cooperation with the Farm Board.

Mr. McKELLAR. The court held that they could not recover. If that is not a judgment, I do not know what a judgment is.

Mr. FRAZIER. The court held in one case that there was no legal way in which they could recover, but that it was a moral claim. A bill has been introduced to pay the claim.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator think that the cotton people should be treated in a more favorable manner than the wheat people?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, one moment. A bill was passed in that connection, and that is all I am asking for now.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senate will accept such a bill as was passed for the wheat cooperatives, I will accept it right now.

Mr. FRAZIER. I wish to say that I think the Senator from Tennessee made a mistake in insisting on the cotton cooperatives being stricken out of my bill. If he had let them stay in the bill, their claim would have gone to the Court of Claims just as did the claim of the wheat cooperatives.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator from North Dakota to say that there is a bill here now to pay the wheat claims?

Mr. FRAZIER. There are two such bills.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, God knows I have tried to be honest in this matter. I have no brief for the cooperatives. Of course, I wish them to succeed, but I would not stand here and plead for a thing I did not believe was just and honest. No man on this floor can ever successfully accuse me—and I hate to make a personal allusion—of being an advocate for a dishonest thing. I would not have been here for 30 years, coming from South Carolina, if I had done so.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator surely does not think that I have accused him, because I did not. The Senator from South Carolina is one of the most honest and upright men I know.

Mr. SMITH. I thank the Senator for that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not accusing the Senator at all.

Mr. SMITH. I listened to the Senator from Tennessee this morning, and in what he said there was an implication of an indictment against his Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I cannot let that statement go by. There is no man in the world who believes in the American Government more than I do, and I am here today fighting for the integrity of my Government and fighting against dishonest claims put up by these cooperatives against my Government.

Mr. SMITH. I said that it was an indictment, and I repeat it, because if Creekmore is the scoundrel he is portrayed to be, he certainly was smarter than the Government, because he could not have gotten the money from the Government if the Government had not been willing to let him have it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think he was smarter than some of the agents of the Government. I very cheerfully accede to that part of the statement.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to know what the Government is if it has no agents. I think the President of the United States is a temporary agent of the people of America, with his duties defined, and we are agents of the people, and you cannot reflect on an agent of the people without reflecting on those who create the agent.

I will say it is a pretty serious indictment to say that this man could get by with all those frauds by and with the cooperation of the Government. But I do not want to get into a discussion of that matter. What I want to say is that I think we should here and now, without any prejudice for or against any man, settle a just claim against the Government, settle what I believe to be due the agents operating under the Farm Board.

I hope the Senate will vote down the proposal to send the matter to the Court of Claims. Everyone knows what that motion is for. Therefore let us defeat it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I reported this bill on behalf of the committee. For some 3 hours from one Senator we have heard that the bill is a dishonest one; that it is a bill in behalf of racketeers. There is but one implication that can come from that charge, Mr. President, and that is that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has reported a dishonest bill in favor of racketeers.

This bill has been before the committee for years. Extensive hearings were held upon the bill by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Different administrations have come and gone, but because of the opposition of one Senator, who under the rule has objected to the bill, it took a motion to bring it before the Senate.

I have no criticism of any action taken by any Member of this body, but under the implication that the bill is a racketeer bill, and that one of the Senate committees has reported a racketeer's bill—I having made the report—I desire to place in the RECORD a portion of the report from one of the Federal agencies that likewise has been criticized on the floor today.

Mr. President, the bill was prepared and reported on the basis primarily of a report submitted by the Farm Credit Administration, of date June 24, 1939. After several pages of factual information this agency of our Government made a report, and in the report it made the following statements of conclusions. The first is:

> The formulas used and the methods of computation seem to us to be fair.

That has relation to the formulas and computations upon which this settlement is suggested, and the amounts recommended by the committee are based upon this formula, and the Farm Credit Administration makes the positive statement on page 6 of the committee report that these formulas and the methods "seem to us", the agency of this Government, "to be fair."

That is the first conclusion.

The second is that the Farm Credit Administration admits that there is no legal claim against the Government.

If there was, Mr. President, such a claim could be asserted in the proper court. No bill comes before the Claims Committee or before the Court of Claims when a legal claim exists for remuneration or for relief. It is only in cases when no legal claims exist that we have claims coming before the Senate, and other claims are, by the Congress, referred to the Court of Claims.

I continue to read—

> The record does not show that there is any legal responsibility on the part of the Government in regard to the claims in question.

That is admitted.

> However, it is clear that the associations did sustain losses in connection with the 16-cent loan program, and there is evidence to show that the Federal Farm Board would have considered a settlement which would have provided for some of the carrying charges and operating expenses had it been legally possible for the Board to do so.
> The question of whether the associations should now be reimbursed because of the stabilization features of the 16-cent loan is, in our view, one for the Congress to decide.

The agency of our Government has not admitted that this bill is a racketeer's measure. This agency has admitted that the associations sustained losses.

Mr. President, I come from a State which produces 1,000,000 bales of cotton a year when conditions are favorable to our farmers in Oklahoma. In my State the farmers growing cotton are strongly organized. The name of their organization is the Oklahoma Cotton Growers' Association. I have received many letters from members of that association importuning me to do what I can to obtain consideration of the bill and to promote its passage. In my State the cotton growers are organized. I cannot speak for the other States. I cannot speak for Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, or any other State, but I can speak for my State. The cotton producers of Oklahoma are organized, and they are behind the proposed legislation.

The Farm Credit Administration states that it does not recommend the proposed legislation because there is no legal claim against the Government, but that the claim is honest, fair, and just. The associations sustained losses, and, in my opinion, the Farm Credit Administration indicated that the losses should be adjusted and paid. The bill has for its purpose the adjustment and payment of the losses.

I read further from the letter of the Farm Credit Administration:

> The question of whether the associations should now be reimbursed because of the stabilization features of the 16-cent loan is, in our view, one for the Congress to decide, and we have felt that we should not go further than to present to your committee such factual information as we were able to find in the records of the Federal Farm Board or to develop from examination of the statements prepared by the associations in support of their position.

Mr. President, on the basis of the report of this Federal agency, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry had the bill prepared. Hearings were held and the bill has been considered by the committee and has been reported for the consideration of the Senate. I submit that the motion to refer the bill to another Senate committee should not be approved.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, it is not my desire to speak at length on the merits of the bill. However, I wish to answer a few of the arguments advanced by the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Downey	King	Reynolds
Ashurst	Ellender	La Follette	Schwartz

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The Senator from Louisiana.

NIAGARA FALLS BRIDGE, NEW YORK

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of House bill 9016, provided the consideration of the bill will not change the status quo of the measure now before the Senate.

The reason for asking to have this bill considered at this time is that it involves an emergency with reference to the construction of a bridge at Niagara Falls; and the bill must be passed and signed by the President by Friday of this week. So, by unanimous consent, I should like to have the bill considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9016) to amend the joint resolution creating the Niagara Falls Bridge Commission.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MEAD. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am familiar with the situation to which the Senator from New York refers. For whatever it may be worth, I should like to say that I think the Senator is justified in asking for the immediate consideration and passage of the bill.

Mr. MEAD. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MEAD. I thank the Senator from Louisiana.

REIMBURSEMENT OF COTTON COOPERATIVES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2585) to reimburse the cotton cooperative associations for losses occasioned by the Federal Farm Board's stabilization operations, and for other purposes.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I am sure my good friend the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] did not mean to cast any reflection on the members of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry when he moved to refer the pending bill to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Tennessee will say most assuredly not.

Mr. ELLENDER. I am glad to hear the Senator say that; yet, judging from the statements made by him in reference to this bill, it would seem that the members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry are parties to a steal.

The affairs of the Federal Farm Board have been the subject of investigation by the Senate on many occasions. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], the minority leader, held hearings with respect to the Federal Farm Board; on another occasion another hearing was held by a Senate committee headed by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]; and on two occasions the affairs of the Board have been investigated by committees headed by the able Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. In connection with all of those investigations, charges were made against the American Cotton Cooperative Association, and testimony was taken in detail, with reference to the affairs of the said association.

As was pointed out by the Senator from Oklahoma, the A. C. C. A. was organized for the express purpose of taking care of the cotton which was then on hand and which was to be handled by the Federal Farm Board.

It is true that the A. C. C. A. has no individual members, for the reason that the A. C. C. A. is composed of associations that are organized in the various cotton-producing States of the Union.

Speaking for the Louisiana Cotton Cooperative Association, I can assure the Senator from Tennessee that ever since its inception it has had a large membership. That membership is not a membership in the A. C. C. A., except indirectly. The Louisiana association is a member organization of the A. C. C. A.

Mr. President, there have been various attempts made ever since 1930, by cotton factors and by cotton merchants to disrupt the affairs of A. C. C. A. I quote from a letter, written back in 1930, which was sent out to various cotton factors. The letter is self-explanatory, and is as follows:

DECEMBER 8, 1930.

Messrs. HARRISS & VOSE,
60 Beaver Street, New York City.

GENTLEMEN: At the request of Mr. Chauncey W. Butler, chairman, finance committee of the American Cotton Shippers' Association, the undersigned have consented to act as a committee to receive subscriptions from cotton merchants and others in New York who would like to contribute to a fund of $100,000 being raised by the American Cotton Shippers Association in furtherance of two major activities: (a) To endeavor to secure amendment or repeal of the Agricultural Marketing Act through Congress; and (b) a country-wide publicity campaign to enlighten the public as to the activities of the Federal Farm Board as at present conducted, and to promulgate the policy of the American Cotton Shippers Association as declared in the following resolutions.

I will not take the time of the Senate to read the resolutions, but I ask that they be incorporated in my remarks at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN in the chair). Without objection, the resolutions will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolutions are as follows:

1. The intrusion and operation of the Federal Government through its subsidiaries in private business is entirely foreign to the principles of American democracy.

2. We assert that the Agricultural Marketing Act, politically created and politically operated, is unsound in principle and dangerous in practice not only to the business of this Nation, whose rights it seeks to destroy, but to the very interests it seeks to aid.

3. We accordingly express our continued opposition to the use of Government funds for the buying and selling of commodities for the purpose of attempted stabilization or otherwise. We condemn as a temporary or permanent policy of government the employment of public funds for the purpose of participation in business in competition with established agencies and support the proposal for an amendment of the Agricultural Marketing Act to modify the bill in this respect. We are not opposed to, and never have opposed, any cooperative movement owned, controlled, and financed by the producers themselves.

4. We have set up an organization with these aims in view, which the committee feels will eliminate these features which have proven and will prove so unsound, uneconomic, and costly to the cotton farmer, namely, the Government in business. Our methods will include educational publicity through every legitimate avenue; lawful efforts to secure the repeal of or amendments to the Agricultural Marketing Act; and many other forms of activity, including cooperation with kindred interests and the farmer himself.

Mr. ELLENDER. I read from a telegram which was sent to cotton merchants for subscriptions to a lobby fund:

NOVEMBER 14, 1930.

You gentlemen are requested to act as a committee to solicit contributions from cotton factors and dealers at Savannah to support a movement fostered by the A. C. S. A. to raise funds to either amend or repeal the Agricultural Marketing Act with special reference to functions of the Farm Board. The amount to be raised from the Georgia shippers and factors is $4,000. In addition to this amount, the firms of Clayton & McFadden will be solicited direct. The quota assessed on Dallas was $10,000, and they raised the amount in 30 minutes. Houston's quota was $10,000, all of which has been pledged. Dameron Williams wires that the interest in the Memphis meeting is spreading and other States are reporting excellent progress. Please be good enough to phone or wire result of your efforts as early as possible, as I am obliged to make a report of the State to Dameron Williams this afternoon. We feel that our existence is at stake and that something must be done immediately and will be done if we have the moral and financial support of the cotton trade.

Terms of subscription: Fourth cash, balance as and if needed.

D. T. MANGET,
Cotton Merchant, Newnan, Ga.

Mr. President, this telegram simply illustrates the effort on the part of cotton factors to do away with—what? With the A. C. C. A., the American Cotton Cooperative Association. The association had trampled on their toes in forcing them to pay more money to the farmers for their cotton. The association offered free information to farmers on cotton prices and helped to grade their cotton so that they could obtain top prices for their staple.

I now quote, in furtherance of my charge that this subject is or was being investigated for the benefit of cotton factors, from a report made by the president of the Memphis Cotton Exchange under date of November 30, 1935. Listen to this, Senators: I am now reading from this report:

Upon taking office last January our president began a movement for the investigation of the cotton cooperatives. For months he has worked tirelessly at this seemingly impossible task. He was finally rewarded, however, when Senator McKELLAR introduced and the Senate passed Senate Resolution 185, authorizing the appointment of a Senate committee to "investigate the expenditures of the Federal Government for cotton cooperatives and the operations of the old Federal Farm Board." On September 19 a general meeting was held, at which time the president was empowered to "communicate with other exchanges and to meet with representatives of these exchanges if necessary; to take all steps necessary to fight the matter to a conclusion and should he decide it necessary, to take the fight into the courts and be advised by legal counsel." Never was work better or more thoroughly done. Your president literally devoted his full time, both day and night, with the result that for the first time the Senate will have a full and true picture showing the activities of the cooperatives.

And in a financial statement rendered to the association by the president appears the following expenditure:

McKellar investigation expense, $5,834.

If one will examine the hearings held in Memphis, it will be apparent that very few farmers testified. Those who appeared were mostly cotton factors, cotton merchants, and, of course, some of the members of the A. C. C. A.

This question was again investigated by the Senate under Senate Resolutions 137 and 205 of the Seventy-fifth Congress. The Agricultural Committee of the Senate went into details in order to get to the bottom of this matter. We had summoned before us many farmers; we had summoned before us members of the State associations that belonged to the A. C. C. A.; and Senators have but to read that record to be convinced that there is absolutely no basis for the charges made by the Senator from Tennessee.

As I pointed out a while ago, the Senator from Tennessee was the sole member of the committee which held hearings at Memphis. I do not believe the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] was there at all, from what I can understand. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] was there for a day or two; and, strange as it seems, the report made by the Senator from Tennessee is directly opposed to the minority report made by the Senator from Alabama; and yet both reports were founded on the same hearings held in Memphis.

In connection with this part of my remarks, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the minority views of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The minority views are as follows:

My approval is withheld from the report submitted by Senator McKELLAR pursuant to the authority of Senate Resolution No. 185, authorizing an investigation into the expenditures by the Federal Government for cotton cooperatives.

The testimony taken comprises 654 printed pages. Therefore, a detailed analysis of this testimony would unnecessarily prolong this report, but the following conclusions seem to me to be warranted:

1. The American Cotton Cooperative Association and its affiliates are farmer-owned and farmer-controlled, and that they are organized and operated in accordance with the letter and spirit of cooperative marketing laws.

2. The Government twice attempted efforts in the nature of stabilization operations, once in the 1929–30 cotton season when an advance of 16 cents per pound was made on cotton delivered through the cooperatives, and again in the 1930–31 cotton season when 90 percent of the market value of cotton was advanced to growers through the cooperatives. The Government has assumed and paid some of the losses incident to these stabilization operations but has not paid all losses.

3. The record shows that in performing the ordinary functions of cooperative marketing associations, exclusive of stabilization operations, American Cotton Cooperative Association and its affiliates on the whole have rendered satisfactory service. Out of over a quarter of a million producer members, less than 20 appeared to protest any grievance or criticism.

The evidence does show that the cotton cooperatives lost certain reserves and were put in debt to the Federal Government as a direct result of stabilization efforts conducted at the instance and under the direction of the Federal Government acting through the Federal Farm Board. The record further shows that since the cessation of these stabilization activities by the Government the operation of the cotton cooperatives as a whole have been conducted in accordance with sound business and cooperative principles. As illustrative of this the evidence conclusively shows the following facts: American Cotton Cooperative Association was organized in 1930 by 13 State and regional cotton cooperative associations with a paid-up capital of only $76,950. This association has accumulated a substantial capital and surplus reserve through earnings. At the close of the 1933–34 season the capital and surplus amounted to $2,355,658.59, and all of this, except the original $76,950, was a result of earnings. These earnings are held for the benefit of the producers whose patronage has contributed to it. At the close of the 1933–34 season, $480,058.20 was distributed by this association as patronage dividends. These results have been accomplished in spite of some testimony by the cotton trade to the effect that the American Cotton Cooperative Association and its affiliates were paying more to producers than the trade could afford to pay, and were selling cotton to the mills at lower prices than the trade could afford to take.

I am impelled to the conclusion that during these years the operations of the cooperatives have reduced the spread between the producer and the consumer to the benefit of both.

4. The record does not justify the assumption that capital loans to the cooperatives are worthless, or that the Government will ultimately lose thereby. I find no basis for reflecting upon the officials of Farm Credit Administration appointed by the President pursuant to the law passed by Congress. None of these officials were called by the subcommittee; and certainly there is no evidence indicating that these capital loans were recklessly, improvidently, or illegally made. I see no reason to believe that the Government's loans are likely to be lost in whole or in part.

5. As to membership relations, the element of coercion is absent. The membership contracts introduced in the record give the members the right to withdraw from membership and cancel the contract. Hence, I am unable to join in the view that the cooperatives retain their membership by coercion or duress.

6. The record shows that the cooperatives have rendered a noteworthy service. Through means of local offices and receiving agents, classing service is widely provided, to the end that farmers who do not know the grade or staple of their cotton, and may not understand its value, are advised in these respects.

A basis sheet is made available throughout the Cotton Belt, and every producer of cotton in the South can ascertain what the cooperatives will pay for his cotton on any date.

Various sales options are provided, including the seasonal pool, the daily fixation pool, and other pools. In the seasonal pool, cotton is sought to be sold in an orderly manner at the average seasonal price received from sales rendered to growers. In the daily fixation pool, the current day's price is given to the farmer. Under the marketing contracts, he has exclusive option control in determining whether to sell through a daily pool or seasonal pool. There is no evidence that the judgment of the association's officials is substituted for his judgment in these particulars.

7. The immediate fixation or daily pool is a natural development of cooperative marketing. If only seasonal pool were offered, financed on a basis of advancing 60 percent of the market value at time of delivery, with subsequent distribution as sales are made from this pool, the effect would be to deny the advantages of cooperative marketing associations and their facilities, to the weakest and neediest of the producers. With more than one-half of the American cotton crop produced under landlord's lien, crop mortgage, or furnishers' lien, the immediate fixation or daily pool is a necessity.

8. The evidence warrants the conclusion that the cooperatives have rendered noteworthy services in the marketing of cotton. To mention only a few, they have eliminated in large areas the purchase of cotton without taking into consideration in price fixing the grade and staple of cotton. The old method is commonly referred to as hog-round buying; they have narrowed the differentials between interior country points and central marketing points; they have contributed to cutting down the spread between the price paid to the producer and the price paid by the mills; and they seek to make the marketing of cotton as direct as can be economically done. The record supports the conclusion that the cooperatives aim to pay to the producer the highest price possible, not to buy his cotton at the lowest price and sell it for the highest price.

9. The record shows that in the operation of the cotton cooperatives, there have been mistakes made. Handling never less than 1,000,000 bales per year since the organization of American Cotton Cooperative Association, it would be well nigh impossible to market so large a volume of cotton without errors and perhaps injustice. But occasional errors should not call for a sweeping condemnation of the entire cooperative marketing system in cotton.

The public policy of the United States is committed to cooperative marketing. It was endorsed in the platform of both political parties in the last Presidential campaign. The cooperatives are seeking, to their credit, out of their own reserves, to build a solid financial structure. To expect the cotton producers immediately to contribute all of the capital needed to finance their operations is vain; and therefore, both major political parties pledged financial aid of the Government to the cooperatives.

It does not appear, as stated, that capital loans to American Cotton Cooperative Association and its affiliates have been recklessly or wantonly made, or that those whom the President has entrusted with responsibility for the affairs of the Farm Credit Administration have been recreant to their trust.

It is a fair deduction, as heretofore pointed out, that the cooperatives lost reserves, which they held for their farmer members, as a direct result of stabilization operations initiated by the Federal Government. The former Chairman of the Federal Farm Board, who was responsible, in part, for the policy initiated and the conduct of the operations, testified that the cooperatives and their members were penalized as a result of these operations. He frankly stated that the Federal Farm Board, at the close of the operation, was compelled to make a harsh and unfair settlement with the cooperatives based upon a legal interpretation of existing statutes. I am forced to the conclusion that the Congress, who alone can right the wrong, should, by appropirate legislation, restore to the cotton cooperatives and to their producer members the reserves which were thus appropirated.

J. H. BANKHEAD.

Mr. ELLENDER. The reason why I asked that the minority views of the Senator from Alabama be inserted at this point is that I propose to read into the RECORD the report which was made by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on June 7, 1938, and to show the similarity of findings in the minority report by the Senator from Alabama and the majority report made by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry under date of June 7, 1938.

I may say that in the resolution which was considered by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in 1938, practically the same charges were made that were made in the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee. If anything, more charges were preferred against the association in the resolutions I have just referred to; that is, Senate Resolutions 137 and 205 of the Seventy-fifth Congress. The Senate committee held hearings for over 4 weeks here in Washington, investigated every detail of the situation, and brought out a report.

The Senator from Tennessee stated, in one of his fraud charges, that the association had reconcentrated 6,000,000 bales of cotton; and he figured that the amount of cotton extracted from those 6,000,000 bales for purposes of regrading would average 3 pounds to the bale, or 30 cents a bale, and left the inference that the association had pocketed $1,800,000. There is absolutely no basis for such a charge.

If the Senator will read the hearings which were held by virtue of the two resolutions I have just referred to, I am sure he will discover that his statement is not correct, that he has made a misstatement of fact, though I am sure that when the Senator made that assertion he must have considered he had some basis for it; but if he will read the hearings he will note that they show that only 1,600,000 bales were handled by the Commodity Credit Corporation for purposes of reconcentration, and not 6,000,000 bales, as he stated.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will examine the exhibits furnished by Mr. Creekmore on pages 751 and 752 of the hearings on Senate Resolution 185, he will find the figures stated there.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, we received our figures from the Commodity Credit Corporation itself; and, from those figures, this is what the committee found:

The Commodity Credit Corporation entered into a contract with the American Cotton Cooperatives Association for the reconcentration and reclassification of approximately 1,600,000 bales of 12-cent loan cotton.

That was the amount given to us by the A. C. C. A., and corresponded to the figures supplied to us by the Commodity Credit Corporation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, all I can say about that matter is that these figures were furnished by Mr. Creekmore himself. Of course, Mr. Creekmore may not have been telling the truth about the matter. I do not know.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, may I refer both Senators to page 499 of volume 1 of the hearings under what is known as the McKellar resolution? At the top of the page the Senator asked the witness, Mr. Creekmore, or whoever it was:

So I am going to ask you a question by which you can help me out. Assuming that 1,600,000 bales have been reconcentrated, what would that have cost under your offer of 40 cents a bale?

So that is where the figure of 1,600,000 bales seems to have been accepted.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, that was just 1 year. This was going on for 5 years.

Mr. ELLENDER. I beg to differ with the Senator from Tennessee about that matter. The only time the A. C. C. A. handled this cotton for reconcentration and reclassification was after 1932.

Mr. McKELLAR. They handled it for 5 years.

Mr. ELLENDER. It was cotton that was left over.

Mr. McKELLAR. A good deal of cotton was left over. Quite 6,000,000 bales, and more than that, was left over; but they handled 6,000,000 bales, and it was sampled three times. Three times the poor farmer had to have it pulled out, and the A. C. C. A. got it. That is all there is about it.

Mr. ELLENDER. I will state to the Senator from Tennessee that the record does not show that; and if anybody should know I believe the Commodity Credit officials ought to know, because they are the ones who paid the bills.

Mr. McKELLAR. They were here in Washington.

Mr. ELLENDER. And I desire to state to the Senator that when the matter of handling this cotton was taken up, bids were submitted, at the suggestion of the Commodity Credit Corporation, by the various cotton factors who could handle it.

The A. C. C. A. made the lowest bid, and, as a matter of fact, the entire cost to the Government of handling this cotton was from 35 to 40 cents a bale.

Let me read from the report, because it demonstrates exactly what the committee found. It is not very long; I am sure Senators will be interested in listening to it:

The Commodity Credit Corporation entered into a contract with the American Cotton Cooperative Association for the reconcentration and reclassification of approximately 1,600,000 bales of 12-cent-loan cotton. The committee find that there was no deliberate or intentional overclassing or underclassing of this cotton.

By the way, one of the additional charges made in the resolution to which I just referred was that there was overclassing. I continue reading from the report:

The evidence shows that the classing was reasonably accurate, considering the inexactness of the existing methods of classifying and grading cotton. The testimony indicates that there was considerable difference with respect to the reclassing and regrading of cotton located in South Carolina, but experienced witnesses agreed and the record indicates that where the same cotton is classed by two competent classers at different times, at different locations, on different samples and under varying conditions as to light, humidity, etc., wide differences in classifications may and do often result. Several witnesses testified that a difference of as much as 30 points was not unusual and their testimony was borne out by actual figures presented to the committee with respect to the regrading of some 40,000 bales in South Carolina. One classification of one-thousand-seven-hundred-and-some-odd bales of certain cotton in South Carolina made by Government classifiers showed little difference when compared to the original classification of American Cotton Cooperative Association. Later on a portion of that same lot of cotton was again regraded and reclassed under Government supervision and differences in classification ranged from 1.7 over to as much as 86.2 under.

On the other hand, the evidence discloses that a comparison made by the Commodity Credit Corporation of the class placed on 64,724 bales of reconcentrated cotton by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics board of examiners and the class placed on the same cotton by American Cotton Cooperative Association showed a difference of less than one point, or less than 5 cents per bale in value. The committee finds that the classification and regrading of cotton made under ordinary trade conditions and in the usual course of business were fairly accurate. There may have been instances where errors occurred in classing individual bales, but on the whole there is little or no cause for complaint.

The committee was unable to discover any motive for the alleged underclassing of said cotton by American Cotton Cooperative Association. Several witnesses testified that the only way by which American Cotton Cooperative Association could have benefited by underclassing was to purchase this underclassed cotton and sell it for a better grade. The evidence discloses that American Cotton Cooperative Association did purchase 135,398 bales, 30 to 40 percent of which was reconcentrated cotton, and an average of $2.05 per bale was paid to the farmers by American Cotton Cooperative Association in addition to the payment of all of the loans with interest, storage, and other carrying charges.

The evidence further discloses that American Cotton Cooperative Association did not buy any of this cotton except at the request of and for the benefit of certain of its associations' farmer members. The evidence does not show that American Cotton Cooperative Association benefited in any of these transactions, except by such profits as may have accrued in the ordinary and usual course of its business. There is no evidence to the effect that any of the members of the association profited through any of these transactions or in fact in any of the dealings of the association.

The Senator from Tennessee has made a charge that exorbitant interest rates were placed on the backs of the farmers by the A. C. C. A. As a matter of fact, the bylaws of the association contain a provision that the association cannot charge more than 1 to 2 percent over and above any rate at which the association is able to get money from the Government. As was pointed out by the Senator from Tennessee, some of the money was obtained at three-eighths of 1 percent, but the rate charged to the farmers was as low as 1⅜ percent and, in some cases, 2⅜ percent.

Mr. McKELLAR. I challenge the Senator to find a record of that being done in any case.

Mr. ELLENDER. I will ask the Senator to read the hearings held by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry pursuant to Senate Resolutions 137 and 205, Seventy-fifth Congress. If he will consult the report he will see that what I have stated is a fact. The evidence was produced not only from officers of the A. C. C. A. but from farmers themselves in answer to a direct charge that the farmers were being mulcted out of thousands of dollars because of high interest rates. In answer to the charge, I repeat, much evidence was produced to show that there was no truth to the accusation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. Let me proceed for a moment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

Mr. ELLENDER. I read from what the committee found with reference to interest rates:

During the 1930–31 and 1931–32 seasons the Federal Farm Board loaned money to American Cotton Cooperative Association at rates of three-eighths of 1 percent, and during subsequent seasons at rates of from 3 to 4 percent. During the 1936–37 and the 1937–38 seasons the Central Bank for Cooperatives charged a rate of interest of 2 percent on commodity loans fully secured.

Prior to 1933–34 American Cotton Cooperative Association made loans to State and regional associations and charged an interest spread of from 1 to 2 percent in accordance with its bylaws. Proceeds from the interest spread have accrued to the State cooperatives. Since the beginning of the 1933–34 season few loans to individual associations have been made and the interest rates ranged from 3 to 5 percent.

In no case has the interest rate been greater than from 1 to 2 percent over the rate of interest the association had to pay for the money. The record shows, as a matter of fact, that the accountants of the Commodity Credit Corporation found that, and one of the accountants so testified before our committee.

With reference to the charge of fraud as to the waiver of prior liens, to which the Senator has referred, those waivers were made at the request of the Board itself so as to facilitate the borrowing of money, and were made only as to a very small amount of cotton. The Association did not ask for that, but the Board itself made the request so as to facilitate bank loans.

With reference to the third charge of fraud made by the Senator from Tennessee, that is, as to the $5,000,000 loan that was made by the Commodity Credit Corporation, the loan was made in good faith. If the A. C. C. A. were to liquidate today, the Federal Government would get every penny it has loaned under this $5,000,000 loan. And I——

Mr. McKELLAR. How much of the $5,000,000 has been paid back up to date?

Mr. ELLENDER. Three hundred and sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. McKELLAR. Four million six hundred and forty thousand dollars is still due.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. And the purpose of the bill is to provide for paying that off, is it not?

Mr. ELLENDER. Part of it will be used for that purpose, yes; the amount now being asked as reimbursement is to cover losses made by various State associations in 1929–30, when said associations, acting through the A. C. C. A., lost the money. The A. C. C. A. went into this deal in good faith in order to help the Government, and the Government took advantage of the facilities offered by these various cotton associations, which operate through the A. C. C. A. The Government desired the services of experienced cotton men to handle such a huge amount of cotton.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, does the Senator remember when Congress passed a measure turning over to the Red Cross certain amounts of the cotton which it had on hand to be manufactured into cotton goods and distributed to the poor? Does he remember that?

Mr. ELLENDER. I remember something about it. A small amount was involved.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator remember how much Mr. Creekmore charged the poor people or the Government for looking after that matter?

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. Creekmore did not charge them a penny. The American Cotton Cooperative Association, of which he was manager, handled that cotton and every penny of profit, if any was made, was reported back to the association, and if any profits were made they were distributed back to the member associations throughout the various States of the South.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator recalls that time and again in the testimony, Mr. Creekmore and other members of the Creekmore firm, their subordinates in each State, were asked to submit lists of any members they had, and they could not do so. How could they distribute sums of money when they had no members?

Mr. ELLENDER. Let me repeat that the A. C. C. A. has no individual membership.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know that.

Mr. ELLENDER. The A. C. C. A. is composed of State associations; I can tell the Senator that the association in Louisiana is composed of many cotton farmers in my State. I do not know exactly what its membership is, but I do know its membership is large, and that the majority of our cotton people are behind the Louisiana association.

As I have just said, the amount of money that was loaned by the Government is safe. It holds as security for the loan the capital stock of the A. C. C. A. Because of the fact that this money was loaned to the association, and for other reasons, the Commodity Credit Corporation audits the books of the A. C. C. A. It keeps tabs on what happens to the money. And I repeat that if the A. C. C. A. were liquidated today every penny would be repaid to the Government, and there would be a surplus to return to the various State associations, composing the A. C. C. A.

It is true that if the pending bill becomes law, whatever amount is due the Government by these various associations will be deducted from such amounts as will come to them.

Mr. President, with reference to the fifth charge, or perhaps the sixth charge which the Senator made concerning the seed loans, here is what the committee found.

The evidence shows no irregularities in the handling of seed-loan cotton. It was disposed of in accordance with rules and regulations of the Farm Credit Administration, and there was no complaint made by seed-loan borrowers.

I repeat that as to those loans, the Farm Credit Administration examined them, and its accountants made reports and audited them, and in fact, did likewise on every transaction that was entered into by the A. C. C. A.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator think that that is an answer to the figures submitted by one of the cooperatives himself, Mr. Henry, that these charges were made to the farmers; that they took $19.50 out of a $51 bale of cotton?

Mr. ELLENDER. Does the Senator know that some of that cotton was in storage for as long as 30 months, and that the figure that he gave was for handling cotton that had been stored for 2½ years? Of course the charges would amount to that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Some cotton was in storage not for 30 months but for 60 months, and some of it had been in storage for 90 months. By the same rule, the poor farmer would not have a red cent in his cotton.

Mr. ELLENDER. The facts show that when that cotton was placed in storage the price was 5 cents or 6 cents a pound. That is all that the farmer would have gotten for his cotton had he sold it then and there. But by keeping it for 30 months, as in the case cited by the Senator, or perhaps 24 months, that cotton sold for 10 cents, and the farmers realized as much as from $10 to $15 a bale more by keeping the cotton in storage. Of course, these various carrying charges, and so forth, had to be paid.

Mr. McKELLAR. There were 1,300,000 bales turned over to the A. C. C. A. out of the 16-cent-loan cotton.

Mr. ELLENDER. One million six hundred thousand.

Mr. McKELLAR. Some of it is still there. But the A. C. C. A. sold 800,000 bales of that cotton and bought futures, and now is claiming expenses on futures—a purely gambling transaction.

Mr. ELLENDER. With all due respect to the Senator from Tennessee, the record does not support his statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. Go ahead. Let the Senator proceed with his speech, and I will give him the record and page in a moment.

Mr. ELLENDER. This may be what the Senator has in mind—the cotton-producers' pool. Let me read what the committee found with respect to that charge:

That the Secretary of Agriculture acquired 2,500,000 bales of cotton, of which 600,000 bales were futures, thereby leaving 1,900,000 bales of actual cotton. Hon. Oscar Johnston was appointed by the Secretary as pool manager and later he entered into a contract with American Cotton Cooperative Association for the handling of said cotton under his direction. The evidence does not show that said cotton was underclassed. The adjustments made on said cotton as a result of underclassing or overclassing were negligible, considering the fact that the classing of cotton is a very inexact science.

The committee wish to quote from the testimony of Mr. Johnston, appearing on page 173 of the transcript, as follows:

"In my experience in handling cotton thirty-odd years, I have never seen nor have had done a nicer marketing job nor more satisfactory marketing job than was done by American Cotton Cooperative Association and their personnel in the handling of that 1,900,000 bales of actual cotton."

The committee believe that Mr. Johnston was fully justified in making the above statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator will find that evidence on page 739 of the hearings to investigate the decline of cotton prices, which I believe was called Senator SMITH's hearings. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] himself reported as follows in those hearings:

The cooperatives, in conducting a seasonal pool, had the responsibility of selling that cotton throughout the season, and if in their judgment they thought it should be carried without fixing the price, they had the right. I feel that in that operation, when they thought it was advantageous to sell the spot cotton, stop carrying charges, and repurchase with futures, that it is as legitimate an operation as is the hedging of cotton, as it is now understood.

They are claiming carrying charges on 800,000 bales of futures that they bought in place of the spot cotton. They had sold the spot cotton at a good price. They wanted to stop carrying charges on it, and they bought 800,000 bales of futures to take its place, and they still want carrying charges on futures.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is not what the report of the Commodity Credit Corporation shows.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am reading from the report made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and he is on the same side. I know the Senator from South Carolina is correct. I will take his statement before that of the Commodities Credit Corporation or any other corporation.

Mr. ELLENDER. Let me read to the Senate what the committee found with reference to the financial statement of the A. C. C. A., and to show that if that association were liquidated today the assets would be more than enough to pay the Government, and leave a handsome surplus for the member associations.

The financial statements furnished to the committee and the evidence of several witnesses, some from the Farm Credit Administration, indicate that American Cotton Cooperative Association is solvent, that its capital and surplus as of June 30, 1937, the close of its fiscal year, amounted to $6,166,245.96. As of February 28, 1938, it had a paid-up capital of $6,154,700 and a surplus of $227,684.76. Five million dollars of this amount represents paid-up capital by the various State associations that own the capital stock of American Cotton Cooperative Association. This latter sum was borrowed from the Farm Credit Administration, repayable over a period of years. To this date, the State associations have repaid $360,000. Seven of the stockholder members have net assets of $1,368,558.08, and five have a combined deficit of $109,859.74.

On March 8, 1938, the State and regional associations owed the Farm Credit Administration a total of $4,640,000. The sum is secured by 57,155 shares of American Cotton Cooperative Association preferred stock, valued at $5,715,500.

During the season 1937–38, the Central Bank for Cooperatives loaned to American Cotton Cooperative Association $5,250,000, of which amount $1,500,000 has been repaid and the balance is not yet due. American Cotton Cooperative Association makes loans from private banks each season ranging from $25,000,000 to as much as $75,000,000. At the request of the Central Bank for Cooperatives, 20 percent of these loans secured by cotton were made from it by American Cotton Cooperative Association.

The evidence discloses that American Cotton Cooperative Association is operated for the benefit of its members and there is no evidence whatever of any speculation in cotton. The cooperatives have handled and hedged cotton received according to normal trade practices. We quote from the testimony of Governor Myers:

"Question. You consider the American Cotton Cooperative Association now fully in accordance with the idea of a cooperative association?

"Mr. MYERS. I think it is fully in accordance with the law. I think like all organizations it falls short of our ideals. I believe intelligent effort has been made and is being made more closely to obtain the ideals of what is expected in a farmer cooperative organization. * * *

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has been talking about $6,000,000 of paid-up stock. Of course, the Senator knows that $5,000,000 of that came from the Federal Government.

Mr. ELLENDER. I so stated.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was loaned by the Federal Government. But does the Senator know that Mr. Creekmore testified—I do not know whether or not he testified to the truth—that only $76,500 had ever been put up by any cooperative of the A. C. C. A. or by all of them together, and that $40,000 of that $76,000 had afterward been withdrawn, leaving only $36,500? That is what they lost when they went into bankruptcy. But at the same time, unfortunately, they lost $207,000,000 of the money of the people of the United States.

Mr. ELLENDER. I challenge that statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator may challenge it, but it is the truth nevertheless.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Federal Farm Board lost the money.

Mr. McKELLAR. The cooperatives recommended it.

Mr. ELLENDER. It was the Federal Farm Board which induced, as it were, the A. C. C. A. to handle the cotton. At the time the price of cotton was pegged at 16 cents. That was done in order that cotton might sell at a better price. The Farm Board contracted with the A. C. C. A. to handle the cotton deal, and it loaned money to the farmers through the A. C. C. A. in order that the cotton could be stored and kept off the market, so as to maintain the 16-cent price previously established. Mind you, all of this was done at the instance and request of the Federal Farm Board itself. Certainly the Senator cannot attribute such losses as were made to the A. C. C. A.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator asked me a question. I recall the testimony of Mr. Creekmore as to how he got into the picture, how Mr. Alexander Legge, a manufacturer from Chicago, came and pleaded with him to take the management of the A. C. C. A. at $75,000 a year out of the money of the American people. Yes; according to Mr. Creekmore, Mr. Legge had a hard time persuading him to take the job at $75,000 a year.

Mr. ELLENDER. It would have cost the American people much more than the $75,000 to which the Senator refers had the cotton been handled by inexperienced managers. These State cooperative associations had been in existence for years and most of them had accumulated fairly large surpluses. They had handled thousands of bales of cotton.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. Just a moment, Senator.

The bill provides for a return to the State associations of money which was actually theirs and which was lost in these operations. That is all the associations ask for, and I think they are entitled to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on the question of experience?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator remembers the firm of John M. Parker, of New Orleans, does he not?

Mr. ELLENDER. They were big cotton factors, cotton merchants.

Mr. McKELLAR. They are very reliable men. Mr. Parker was formerly Governor of the State.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. And he would carry out any contract he made.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes; he was a very honorable man. He made a good Governor. I supported him.

Mr. McKELLAR. On page 495 of the record Mr. John M. Parker testified that when he learned that the A C. C. A. was to handle the cotton at an average of 43 cents a bale he wrote to Mr. Lynn P. Talley, president of the Commodity Credit Corporation, and offered to do the same work for 40 cents a bale and that they turned him down and took the higher price.

Mr. ELLENDER. As far as I know, neither Mr. Parker nor any other factor put in such a bid. The bid of the A. C. C. A. covered expenses for regrading. As I pointed out a while ago——

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall read the bid.

Mr. ELLENDER. As I pointed out a while ago, the Commodity Credit Corporation asked for bids from factors to handle the cotton, and the lowest bid was that of the A. C. C. A., which got the contract. The cost to the Government was from 35 to 40 cents a bale for handling the cotton, plus the cost of regrading in some instances.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me to do so, I shall read an excerpt from the bid of Mr. Parker:

> Our headquarters are in New Orleans, but we have an office in Shreveport, La., and another in Natchez, Miss., and have a traveling representative in Arkansas, and feel that we are capable of giving you very prompt and efficient service, and hereby agree to handle all reconcentration of cotton in the above three States, performing all necessary details in connection with same, for a service charge of 40 cents per bale, and trust you will see your way clear to favor us with this portion of the reconcentration, and await your advices accordingly.
> Yours very truly,
> JOHN M. PARKER CO.

The Senator will see that the higher bid, and not the lower bid, was accepted. The Senator himself has already testified to the high character, fitness, and ability of Parker & Co. to carry out their bid.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the figures just quoted by the Senator, but I note that the service charge was 40 cents per bale. That bid evidently did not include the cost of regrading.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure the Senator was not aware of those figures.

Mr. ELLENDER. My recollection is that this offer was made by the Parker Co. after the contract was entered into with the A. C. C. A. In any event the bid of the A. C. C. A. covered service charges, as well as the cost of regrading. As I recall the cost of regrading amounts to 5 cents per bale.

Mr. President, as I have just pointed out, this is a just claim. This amount is not to be paid to the A. C. C. A., as has been alleged by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], but it is to be credited to each State association whose assets were lost back in 1929 and 1930, when their funds were used to help the Federal Government dispose of cotton which belonged to the farmer. The whole idea of the Farm Board was to peg the price of cotton at 16 cents, and in order to try to do that it was necessary that the cotton be kept from the markets. The Board selected the A. C. C. A. to handle all these cotton transactions. The A. C. C. A. acted as an agent, as it were, for the Government; and all that is now being asked is a return to the State associations of the money which was actually lost by them in this transaction.

Let me say in conclusion that it is my belief that the Federal Government should encourage these cooperative associations. They save millions of dollars each year for the farmers; they serve as backlogs and are not in the business to make money. They keep the farmers posted with respect to the cotton market and also help them to grade their staple so that the best prices obtainable can be secured. Let me quote from a report of the Federal Trade Commission, 1937, Agricultural Income Inquiry, page 48:

> Although a measure of proof in the terms of dollars and cents of the value of cooperative associations is difficult to obtain, the Commission desires to add its opinion to the vast body of opinion to the effect, namely, that true cooperative associations have been of great value to the producers of farm products. These cooperatives have significantly increased the bargaining strength of producers and have reduced the spread between producers' and consumers' prices. In the marketing of cotton, for example, the cooperative serves its members in the classing, assembling, and sale of cotton in merchandisable quantities of each grade and staple, thus enabling its members to sell their cotton on the basis of actual grade and staple, rather than to sell it without classing or on the unfavorable classing of the country buyer. Moreover, the financial strength of the cooperative makes possible the orderly marketing of crops and more favorable prices for its members.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed following my remarks a memorandum for Farm Credit Administration from Mr. C. G. Henry, dated March 6, 1940.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> Any appraisal of the cooperative movement as it applies to cotton must deal not only with such things as volume handled, profits made or lost, extent of membership, and other details common to any cooperative enterprise, but above and beyond all of that must come an estimate of the benefits and services which such organizations provide and what effect these have on cotton farmers in general. In other words, service for the common good.
> In the belief that efficient marketing and increased farm income for all cotton farmers is one of the justifications for present cooperative law and the assistance and support financially by the Farm Credit Administration of the cotton cooperatives, we review briefly below some of the broader benefits which accrue to cotton farmers generally because of the operations of the cotton cooperative associations.
> We have always felt that the main object of cooperative marketing was to reduce the spread between the producer and the consumer, thereby giving the producer a greater percentage of the consumer's dollar. I quote here from a Government bulletin issued this year, which gives some discouraging figures. I do not know just what commodities are included in the report nor how many of them are handled by cooperatives, but it is a serious statement and a challenge to the agencies responsible for the cooperatives:
>
> "In the face of all the growth of cooperative marketing, this spread between producer and consumer, instead of decreasing has increased. As shown in a recent release by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, dated February 1939, the cost of distributing 58 selected foods has been greatly increased since before the war. The percentage of the consumer's food dollar which was paid for transportation, processing, distribution, and all other marketing costs, has increased from an average of 45 percent for the 8 years from 1913 to 1920 to 54 percent for the decade from 1921 to 1930, and to 60 percent from 1931 to 1938."
> In contrast with that record we believe and claim that the existence and operation of the cotton cooperatives, covering the entire Cotton Belt, had decreased this spread and had increased the price to all cotton producers, or, in other words, raised the level of prices paid to the farmer a minimum of one-half cent a pound, which means $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 per annum.
> In support of this statement, I quote here from the last number of the Progressive Farmer. Dr. Clarence Poe is generally recognized as the leading agricultural authority of the South and he has been in touch with the cotton cooperative movement from its beginning. Says Dr. Poe:
> "Many take for granted the revolutionary changes that have occurred in the handling of cotton during the last 15 years. Do you remember what it cost you to market a bale of cotton 20 years ago? It didn't just happen that the trade is now handling cotton for a small fraction of what it formerly charged. It came about as a result of the competition of the cotton co-ops.

"Now that the 'water' has been squeezed out of cotton handling charges, cotton co-ops are no longer able to announce the large cash savings to their patrons as in old days. It is perhaps accurate to say the present value of cooperatives to farmers is not so much what they themselves are able to do, but rather what they are keeping the other fellow from doing."

To substantiate this statement, I quote a report made by Senator BANKHEAD after the McKellar investigation of the cotton cooperatives. No official of the Government is better posted on cotton cooperative operations than this Senator:

"The evidence warrants the conclusion that the cooperatives have rendered noteworthy services in the marketing of cotton. To mention only a few, they have eliminated in large areas the purchase of cotton without taking into consideration in price fixing the grade and staple of cotton. The old method is commonly referred to as hog-round buying. They have narrowed the differentials between interior country points and central marketing points; they have contributed to cutting down the spread between the price paid to the producer and the price paid by the mills; and they seek to make the marketing of cotton as direct as can be economically done. The record supports the conclusion that the cooperatives aim to pay to the producers the highest price possible; not to buy their cotton at the lowest price and sell it for the highest price."

To further substantiate our statement, I quote below from a report of the Federal Trade Commission, 1937, Agricultural Income Inquiry, page 48:

"Although a measure of proof in the terms of dollars and cents of the value of cooperative associations is difficult to obtain, the Commission desires to add its opinion to the vast body of opinion to the effect, namely, that true cooperative associations have been of great value to the producers of farm products. These cooperatives have significantly increased the bargaining strength of producers and have reduced the spread between producers' and consumers' prices. In the marketing of cotton, for example, the cooperative serves its members in the classing, assembling, and sale of cotton in merchandisable quantities of each grade and staple, thus enabling its members to sell their cotton on the basis of actual grade and staple, rather than to sell it without classing or on the unfavorable classing of the country buyer. Moreover, the financial strength of the cooperative makes possible the orderly marketing of crops and more favorable prices for its members."

During this marketing season, on account of finances, we were compelled to reduce our operations over 50 percent and to such a low volume that our influence and effect on prices was negligible. The basis or premiums and discounts as compared to the New York future market are this year the lowest in 20 years, and we feel that our being out of the market is one of the major causes of this price situation. The basis is down from 1.25 to 3.75 below normal, which means a loss to the farmers of about $30,000,000 on this crop.

If our contention is correct that the existence of the cotton cooperatives has materially increased the income of cotton farmers by narrowing the spread between the price paid by the mill and that received by the farmer, then it follows that the United States Department of Agriculture, the Farm Credit Administration, and other agencies are justified by law and by a common objective in the public interest in aiding and financing the operations of the cotton cooperative set-up in order to help maintain farm income.

In addition, the cotton cooperatives have taken a prominent part in the reduction of freight rates on cotton, reduction of warehouse and compress rates, improved ginning, warehousing, and handling methods, which has resulted in definite financial benefit to all cotton producers.

This material is too long and detailed for the purposes of this memorandum, but will be the subject of a supplemental memorandum filed with the Farm Credit Administration at a later date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I was taken to task by my distinguished friend from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] a while ago for saying that 6,000,000 bales of cotton were handled by the A. C. C. A. I was mistaken to a slight degree. Instead of being 6,000,000, the number was 5,927,116 bales, so that there were a few thousand bales lacking to make the number 6,000,000 bales. Of this amount, 1,600,000 bales were of 12-cent-loan cotton; 200,000 bales were 10-cent-loan cotton, and there were 69,000 bales of other cotton, making a total of 1,869,000 bales. However the A. C. C. A. handled in addition 494,940 bales for the Farm Credit Administration; they also handled 1,768,840 bales for the Agricultural Adjustment Administration and 1,794,336 bales for the Oscar Johnston pool, which will be recalled. Those amounts added to the reconcentrated cotton made the total 5,927,116 bales.

So I made a mistake of 72,884 bales out of 6,000,000 bales; that is all.

They sampled all this cotton. They sampled it every time they used it. They took a sample when they first put it into the warehouse; when they would change it to another warehouse they would take another sample from it; and finally, when the cotton was sold, it was sampled again. They took out, according to the testimony, from 1 pound to 1 pound and a half every time. It was sold as what we call loose cotton. All Senators from the South understand that term. Loose cotton sells for a little less than ordinary cotton of the same classification, but it brings about 10 cents a pound when cotton is worth about 10 cents a pound, or in that neighborhood. So that 30 cents a bale was a very small estimate; it may have been as much as 45 cents a bale, and it would amount to a neat little income for the A. C. C. A. of $1,800,000 at the lowest calculation.

That is just one of the things that were done.

Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this never was a cooperative association. A cooperative association has been defined by the book as follows:

> Business cooperatives are created by farmers as agencies through which they collectively sell their products or purchase their supplies. Such cooperatives, being owned and controlled by the members, should at all times have the wholehearted participation of these members in risks, gains, and losses.

This association never took any part of the risks. Although the Government lost $207,000,000, the Government bore the loss. Not a farmer bore it, and he should not have borne it. The cooperatives did not bear it. They had made money at times. They were in the gambling business. They were in the futures business. They bought 800,000 bales of futures in 1 year out of a total of 1,300,000 bales of cotton they had. They are claiming carrying charges on 1,300,000 bales of cotton, when as a matter of fact they sold that cotton at around 17 cents a pound and bought futures and had no carrying charges; or, if they had, they were gambling charges. Surely the Government is not going to permit any organization created under its laws to go into the gambling business—and it was just a pure gambling business from beginning to end, and is today. They are gambling with the Government's money, not with theirs. They never put any money into this undertaking, so far as it has been ascertained. There is no record evidence of a dollar ever being put in by the cooperatives themselves.

The A. C. C. A. was formed, so Mr. Creekmore has said, with $76,500 of capital. It was doing hundreds of millions of dollars of business on $76,500 of capital; and after that was paid in, so he says, $40,000 of it was withdrawn. That left $36,500 of the amount they originally put in, if they ever put in a cent. There is no record evidence that they ever put a single dollar into this business. They were not cooperatives, because cooperatives take part in the risks, the gains, and the losses of the business operations. Therefore, the members, in building such cooperatives, should invest therein substantial amounts of their own funds, commensurate with the needs of the business.

They never invested their own funds. The Government has been behind this undertaking from the very beginning. It was started in 1923, and incurred loss after loss, loss after loss. When there were gains we never heard anything from them, but only when there were losses, and the Government paid them.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. Has the Senator any testimony to show how much the Government lost through the A. C. C. A. since the Federal Farm Board transaction?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. My recollection is, taking it all together——

Mr. ELLENDER. No; I am talking about the time since the Federal Farm Board transactions.

Mr. McKELLAR. My recollection is that the predecessor of this Association lost $139,000,000, and since that time the A. C. C. A. has lost enough to make the total $207,000,000. Now we are called on to lose more, for what?

If you have some money you want to give away, I ask you, in the name of the hard-pressed cotton farmers of the South, to give it to them. Do not give it to these piratical men, these racketeers; give it to the farmers. If you want to give it to anybody—it is absolutely a gift—in God's name give it to the farmers that these people have been robbing. Give it to the poor people who borrowed 50 or 60 dollars each from the seed-loan office with which to make a crop; and, by the way, they paid back every bit of it. They pay their debts. In God's name, why not give it to them, if you are going to give it to anybody? Why single out these pirates, these racketeers, these smooth, slick, ingratiating, slimy men? Why give it to them? Why do you not give it to the farmers?

If anybody proposed to give $4,500,000 to the farmers, or any considerable body of them, I might be induced to vote for it; but do not vote to give it to these men who have been working the farmers for the past 10 years, who have been despoiling the farmers, charging a poor producer of a bale of cotton, who sold it for $51.37, nineteen dollars and some odd cents as commissions and expenses, and all that.

As the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] said a while ago, the southern cotton farmer has been hard-pressed. I think the wheat farmer in the West has been hard-pressed, and the corn farmer, too; but I know that the southern cotton farmer has been hard pressed. If we are going to give away the Government's money, for Heaven's sake let us give it direct to the farmers, and not give it to those who have been despoiling the farmers for all these years.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. I desire to repeat the question I have just asked the Senator: How much money has the Government lost through the association since its dealings with the Federal Farm Board?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall have to speak from recollection. Before the cooperatives came, the old ones had lost $139,000,000 of good money. Since that time the Government has lost up to $207,000,000, and the cooperatives have been managing the transactions for the Board all the time.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator, of course, is referring to the losses made by the Farm Board.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, well, these persons were the agents of the Farm Board. They had control of the matter. They were using the Government's money. They are responsible for it. When the Board was Republican I used to take a few shots at it, because I thought the Republicans were very unwise to allow these racketeers to run the Board; but they did run it, and they lost over $200,000,000 of the people's money. I am opposed to paying those gentlemen for losing the people's money, and it shall never be done so long as I can help it.

Mr. ELLENDER. If the Senator will permit me to comment, other than the association's transactions with the Federal Farm Board, on all of its dealings with the Federal Government in borrowing money through the various agencies of the Federal Government, the Federal Government has not lost one thin dime through the A. C. C. A. The record shows that, Mr. President.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Louisiana and I disagree about that. All you have to do to ascertain the facts is to look at the Government's financial report. They lost the money. It went to the cooperatives, and they lost it. It has been taken out of the Treasury.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH. When the Farm Board asked the cooperatives to be their agents, and said to them, "The amount of money you need will be forthcoming," the cooperatives throughout the country acted as the agents of the Farm Board to take in this cotton, to sample it—that is, to get the grades and staple—and insure it, and store it. They loaned 16 cents a pound on it, but they assumed the responsibility of furnishing the money to pay the incidental charges; and they thought, as every other man would think, that the Farm Board, through their own business, would reimburse them for these charges. Now the Senator says he is willing to reimburse the farmer.

I have had some personal experience with this matter. There was a reserve fund in a cooperative association in my State. The farmers had put in their money and created the reserve fund. The reserve fund was used for paying interest and storage and insurance charges. When the cooperatives went to settle, they said to the Board, "What about your paying us back for these incidental expenses, which will just about take up our reserves?" The Board said, "Well, we will get together," and they did; and they had about reached an agreement when the Attorney General said, "But there is no law which enables you to be reimbursed for an absolutely honest outlay of the farmer's money."

That happened in the case of every association; and all that this bill asks is to let us by law reimburse the persons who, in the honest discharge of their relationship as the agents of the Farm Board, assumed this responsibility, thinking the Government would reimburse them, and they lost all their reserves, and it practically put them out of business. Some of them have reorganized so as to start anew. The money is not to go to the A. C. C. A., except as the central agent, but they are obligated to every association which cooperated in handling the cotton.

I do not like to see my friend from Tennessee get clear off the track, and charge racketeering and thievery and such things. I subscribe to the adage that a man is innocent until he is proven guilty. I hold no brief for any of the members of the A. C. C. A., but I believe they are just as honest as I am, or they could not have been reelected by a board of honest men, recognized by the Government, treated by the Government as honest men, and have had money loaned to them. They are charged with the performance of a duty, and I do not like to hear a man denounced as a thief and a racketeer, when he is an honorable citizen, until he is actually proven guilty by a court of competent jurisdiction.

I think the Senate should recognize that these men have worked hard to establish some kind of a buffer between the buyers of farm products, the brokers, the merchants, and the farmers. They do not want an organization which will not get what is justly due them. I do not think my friend from Tennessee wishes to rise here and join forces with those who from time immemorial have preyed upon the helpless, unorganized, and defenseless producers of the food we eat and the raw material which goes into the clothes we wear. We are entitled to see that they have some kind of permanent relief, and the nearest approach to it has been our attempt to form cooperative organizations which will pool their products and put competent men in charge to act for them, as they are incompetent to act for themselves. We do not get anywhere by charging them with being thieves and robbers. I do not see any evidence of it.

If there were more Senators present, and I thought I might influence some of them to see the truth, I might speak further on this matter. Of course, these men may have made some mistakes, but this bill does not refer to the general transactions of the cooperatives; it refers to their relation to the Farm Board. The Government established the Farm Board. I was a member of the committee which framed the law; it was one of the best prepared acts ever passed by Congress, and it failed because the farmers, themselves not understanding what it was for, the shrewd businessmen who did not want it to interfere with their sweet pickings of the farmers destroyed it. The Senator from Tennessee knows that as well as I do. The Senator recalls that his friends in Memphis raised a fund of some sixty thousand or a hundred thousand dollars to defeat the very effort the Government was making in trying to organize the farmers, the Government doing all it could, suffering losses in order to help the farmers to understand that unity and organization were their only hope of anything like a return to them for the labor they put in.

As to the men whom the Senator charges with being racketeers, I do not believe they are. I have come in contact with them, and I bear testimony to the fact that after I made an investigation of charges which came from my State, I found that some mistakes had been made, but I did not believe those responsible benefited $1 by them. I was thought an enemy of cooperation, and some were hardly speaking to me, and were looking at me askance, when the only object I had was to find out whether or not there had been malfeasance in their responsibility. I am glad to testify that I believe they are just as honest as is the Senate.

All I am asking for is that the Government pay back to the cooperatives throughout the South what is justly due them. They used their money as the agents of a governmental function, and then they met with the officials of the Government and it was decided that it was a just debt. I have evidence right here to show that Government officials did say, "We think this is a moral obligation." To come here now and say they are trying to chisel and cheat someone is covering a lot of territory. It is tantamount to saying that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate is backing racketeers, that the financial agents of the Government cooperated with them in stealing money. Perhaps we had better disband the Government and the Senate and everything connected with it, and start from Tennessee and get things right. [Laughter.] Why not?

Mr. President, I have always tried to be on the side of clean, clear-cut, decent business. But there is no use talking further; there are very few Senators present, though I think those who are present and listening to me are the best samples of the membership of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator desires to make a speech, I will yield to him, then I will make mine later.

Mr. SMITH. I thought the Senator had made three.

Mr. McKELLAR. I may have, but I am going to make some more.

Mr. SMITH. So will I.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the predecessors of those who made the 16-cent loan—and that is what is involved here—recommended the very thing of which they now complain. I will ask Senators to listen to what I am about to read. This is from C. O. Moser, who at the time to which I am about to refer, was president of the cooperatives, the old American Cotton Growers' Exchange.

Question. Now, Mr. Creekmore, will you permit me to read just a short paragraph from Mr. C. O. Moser, president and general manager of the cooperatives at that time? If you will note, the Federal Farm Board's announcement appeared on October 21, 1929—

That was the announcement increasing the price from 12 cents to 16 cents—

just 10 days before the Farm Board made this announcement, and this is the recommendation of Mr. C. O. Moser.

I wish to read it, as it is short.

It is therefore at a time like this that it is possible for us to advance nearer the market price—

Cotton was selling at about 17½ cents when this letter was written—

It is therefore at a time like this that it is possible for us to advance nearer the market price than it would be earlier in the season, when the size of the crop is less a calculable thing than it is now.

I believe—

This is Moser, head of the cooperatives, head at the time of the transaction it is desired to set aside—

I believe the cotton cooperatives, with the aid of the Farm Board—

Not the Farm Board with the aid of the cotton cooperatives—

I believe the cotton cooperatives, with the aid of the Farm Board, may with safety, and they should, immediately, advance 16 cents a pound, or $80 a bale, on unfixed cotton, basis ⅞-inch middling; and that wide publicity to such advance should be given as being the joint program of the cotton cooperatives and the Farm Board.

A joint program of the cooperatives and the Farm Board, being recommended by the Chairman of the Farm Board! Mr. Creekmore, who sits in the gallery, was not even connected with the cotton cooperatives at that time, according to his own testimony—and that the difference between 65 percent advanced at the time of delivery and the $80 a bale should be paid to the members as soon as weight and grade of cotton is established.

That letter left some place in Texas on the 11th of October; it reached Washington about the 14th or 15th; it reached Mr. Legge a day or two later; and now listen to this, the order of the Farm Board in reply to this letter:

The Federal Farm Board believes that the prevailing prices for cotton are too low.

Using the very words of Mr. Moser:

The Board will make supplemental loans to the cooperatives in amounts sufficient to make the average loan 16 cents a pound.

This is what Mr. Creekmore said about that. Mr. Creekmore has been investigated many times, and he has testified to a great deal. I asked him if that was not the letter:

Mr. CREEKMORE. I had never heard of such a letter, and I am going to have to go into a little personal history to get this picture before you.

Incidentally, he afterward admitted that the letter was sent to everyone of the cooperatives. It was published throughout the Nation in the succeeding testimony. Here is what he said about it then:

I was not with the cooperatives at that time. But let me explain.

Question. Yes, sir.

Mr. CREEKMORE. I had never heard of such a letter, and I am going to have to go into a little personal history to get this picture before you.

And here is the picture he gave of himself at that time:

Mr. CREEKMORE. Because it is not a matter of personal gain to me. It is a matter of whether or not these farmers were unduly penalized.

He is talking about farmers now. He was not asking for money for the cooperatives. He was asking for money for the farmers. It was on that pretext that he always came here to get money.

I am first going to mention that Mr. Moser's letter, a copy of which I had made yesterday, and read for the first time last night, states my inner thoughts.

He approved it.

In other words, it indicates all the way through that it was a personal communication from him to Carl Williams. Frankly, I did not believe the directors of the A. C. C. A. or the directors of the various associations had received such a letter, but I was very busy on the telephone last night, and I find that that letter was sent to the various associations.

Incidentally I have the letter here from the association to Mr. Williams urging that this order be put in.

Whether or not they read it I don't know, but the reason I believe that it was never given to the Federal Farm Board is because I was on intimate terms with Alexander Legge, which was because when I first was approached to take the managership of this position, which I now hold, I was told the story, and told the directors of the A. C. C. A. at that time who asked me to take the position that I did not want it, but in appreciation of the fact that they had considered me—

He did not say anything about the $75,000 a year, the salary he was to get, at that time—and in consideration of my belief that the Farm Board in their attitude at that time, in January or February 1930, was so unfair, that if they cared to have me do so, I would go to the Farm Board, and I believed I could present the situation to them in a way that they would correct the injury that was being proposed.

I went to the Farm Board. I stated my case as I understood it, merely in return for the compliment which had been paid me. I had no idea of taking the position. I told the cooperatives first, and I told them several times later that I would not take it. When I finished, Mr. Alexander Legge, whom I had met for the first time that morning, asked me if I would stay over and talk with him that night, and in the belief that I might by a conversation convince Mr. Legge of the injustice of the settlement which was then being made, I agreed to say, and instead of staying 1 night I stayed 2 days. Mr. Legge was very busy in the daytime, and I would breakfast with him in the morning and would have dinner with him in the evening, and generally I would stay with him until 10 or 11 o'clock. My argument to Mr. Legge was this—and if I argued it once I argued it a hundred times, because it was several months before we reached a settlement which, in effect, the Frazier bill, if adopted, gives us.

He was testifying in favor of the Frazier bill then.

Mr. Legge, without consultation on the part of the cooperatives, announced the 16-cent loan.

I have before me a letter from the president of the cooperatives urging that this loan be made of which complaint is now made. Now, after 10 years have passed, it is proposed to rip up a solemn agreement made between the judges and the various cooperatives, and pay these people four and one-half million dollars more out of the Treasury of the United States. That is what is proposed to be done 10 years after the transaction occurred, and after they had solemnly settled the matter.

Mr. SMITH. Let me read a paragraph to the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. I read as follows:

James C. Stone, Chairman of the Federal Farm Board, succeeding Alexander Legge, its first Chairman, testified at the McKellar hearing in Memphis, Tenn., in part, as follows:

"The original thing we did, which we agreed to do, which we thought was the fair thing to do, and which was agreed to by Mr. Legge and myself and Mr. Stanley Reed and the balance of the Board, was the agreement which the Attorney General turned down as not being legal. * * * I figure it was never fair to hold the members of the cooperatives responsible for an act which was done for the purpose of maintaining a price for all cotton."

That is from Mr. Stone, the Chairman of the Federal Farm Board, who succeeded Mr. Legge.

Mr. McKELLAR. That contradicts the testimony of Mr. Creekmore, and I do not know which one was telling the truth. I am frank to say I am not passing judgment on that. Here is what he said to Mr. Legge at that time.

I said not only to Mr. Legge, but I said it to the members of the Federal Farm Board not once but dozens of times, "You did not consult the cooperatives."

And he did not consult them.

Let me read some of the letters that were sent out prior to that time. I have before me a letter from Mr. Jones, at that time Commissioner of Agriculture, and other letters, all of which requested that this loan be increased to make the price of cotton go up. It was then 17½ cents a pound, and when they got to fooling with it, what did it do? Did the price go up? No; it went down, and reached a point very much lower. Who bore the loss? Did those who bought the futures, or those who had the cotton? No; they did not bear the loss. The United States Government bore the loss to the tune of $139,000,000. And then, when confronted with that loss, a solemn settlement was made with the Government of the United States, after the settlement had been examined by the Attorney General of the United States, and an agreement was signed, the Government assuming the losses. The officials of the cooperatives had received big salaries all that time from Government money. The presidents of the various State organizations received about $6,000 a year. Mr. Creekmore received $75,000 a year while presiding over the central organization, until the Congress by an act reduced it. It took an act of Congress, a solemn act of Congress, to reduce Mr. Creekmore's salary. He was being paid out of Government funds, and it took an act of Congress to reduce his salary from $75,000 to $35,000 a year. I think he still gets his expenses in addition to his salary, and probably gets along fairly well. Other officers get their salaries, but from Government money.

Mr. President, I do not believe that is right. Senators here have defended this situation. My friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], my friend the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], my friend the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] have defended the claim. Assuming all they say to be absolutely correct, why should not the Senate want to know more about this thing before it gives these gentlemen four and a half million dollars? Does not the Senate think some accountant ought to pass on the question? Does not the Senate think some organization ought to pass on the claim and report the facts to us? Mr. President, I do. I think it should be done by all means.

I wish to call attention to the peculiar kind of organization we are dealing with. It is called by some a farm organization. It is not anything of the kind. It is an interlocking directorate. I shall explain the situation to the Senate. Six of the managing directors of the State organizations are also directors of the central body, the American Cotton Cooperative Association. They are C. C. Selden, California Association; W. R. Squires, Southwestern Irrigated Association; P. E. Harrill, Oklahoma Association; A. D. Stewart, Mississippi Association; J. A. Beatty, Alabama Association; J. S. Hathcock, South Carolina Assocaton. These gentlemen, with Mr. Creekmore, absolutely control this mercantile association. It is not a cooperative at all. It has no semblance to a cooperative organization. It is a mercantile corporation buying and selling cotton.

Creekmore controls it, just as one controls the knife in his pocket. He is the cooperative. He is Creekmore and company. He is in control of every operation of the A. C. C. A.

To these six must be added Mr. N. C. Williamson, of the Louisiana Association, who receives no salary, but a per diem of $25 is paid him; also Mr. Charles G. Henry, of the Mid-South Association at Memphis, who does not draw a salary from the A. C. C. A., but who is one of the directors, and it is easy to see from his testimony and from Mr. Creekmore's testimony the close cooperation between them.

I do not know whether or not Mr. Henry is present today. He was here a few days ago, when the bill was expected to come up, and is probably now in the gallery, anxiously waiting for the Senate to vote him his share of four and a half million dollars of Federal money.

The other six directors seem to be beyond the pale and certainly have no potential vote, as they receive no salary either from the central association or their own organizations.

They do not receive any salary unless they are in the Creekmore crowd. Creekmore controls it. Creekmore dominates it, just as Hitler dominates Germany today—even more so. He absolutely controls the thing. He is the brains behind it. He is the scheming, crafty man behind this alleged cooperative movement, which has no semblance of cooperation about it.

The officers of the cotton cooperatives claim that their membership in the United States in these 15 associations numbers 259,000. A list of the members was requested by the committee, but the same was refused unless the committee would keep it confidential.

Why? Because they did not have it. The only members they had were those they claimed by reason of selling cotton to a man whom they had never seen before, and not paying the check until he signed a receipt saying he was a member of the cooperative association. It is practically undisputed that there is no association. The whole thing is Creekmore. Creekmore is the one outstanding figure in it.

Many years before the organization of A. C. C. A. it seems there were associations formed in various cotton localities of the United States. Since the A. C. C. A. came into existence, there have been few members obtained except under what may be termed substantial duress.

I think there is no doubt that there was duress.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to give just a little history of this matter under our present administration. This thing was started under the Hoover administration.

The foregoing is a history of the operations of the cotton cooperatives with the Farm Board up until March 4, 1933. The Congress meeting that year repealed the Farm Board Act and passed what is known as the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which set up the Farm Credit Administration in place of the Farm Board. At that time the cotton cooperatives owed the Government $207,418,246.48. (See McNary report, p. 35.)

Two hundred and seven million dollars, according to the report made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], who examined into the question.

Talk about examination. These people have been examined ever since they started. Why? Because they were dishonest and corrupt. Examination after examination has been made of them; and while they have occasionally obtained a clean bill of health, for the most part the figures entirely condemn them.

At that time cotton was worth somewhere around 5 or 6 cents a pound, and the Farm Board, which had had appropriations to be used as a revolving fund of $500,000,000, and the A. C. C. A., which had been financed by the Farm Board, were all in a state of bankruptcy and their debts had to be assumed by the Government, amounting to $27,376,998.06, as outlined in the 90-percent loan loss. Also the State associations benefited under the terms of the A. A. A. adjustment by additional payments authorized by Congress in connection with the settlement of the 1930–31 operations. Seven hundred and thirty-two thousand four hundred and fifty-six dollars and eighty-seven cents were paid in this adjustment (S. Rept. No. 1456, p. 22).

In that adjustment the Government paid them money; and now they ask for carrying charges for 800,000 of the 1,300,000 bales of cotton handled by them in that loan. They sold 800,000 bales of spot cotton, and substituted futures for it. They had a membership on the cotton exchange, which everybody knows is a gambling transaction so far as cotton is concerned. They were gambling with the Government's money. They had everything to win and nothing to lose. Why should they not gamble with the Government's money so long as the Government allowed them to gamble?

In other words, the new administration of Mr. Roosevelt started off by wiping the slate clean and taking over all the cotton into what was known as the Oscar Johnston pool.

Senators will remember that pool.

Thus the cotton cooperatives were again saved from bankruptcy and the Government, through Mr. Johnston, took over about 1,300,000 bales of actual cotton and approximately another million bales of futures which the A. C. C. A. had gathered in during the years of their speculation.

Mr. President, I exceedingly regret to differ with some of my colleagues. It is no pleasant task for me; but, unfortunately for me—if I may so express it—I made an examination of this crowd of what I call racketeers, and I know that I am right about the matter. I know how they preyed upon and swindled the Government during all these years. I should be recreant to my duty as a Senator if I did not bring the facts before the Senate; and I intend to bring all the facts before the Senate.

I ask the Senator from Alabama to allow the bill to go to the Claims Committee. I am perfectly willing to have the matter go to the Court of Claims. I am perfectly willing to have it settled in any court. I want it to be examined into. I want the facts to come out. If I am wrong, I want to know it; but, in my judgment, I am not wrong.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, the report from which I have just read. I think it will be very enlightening to all Senators who are considering this matter.

There being no objection, the report (No. 1819, 74th Cong., 2d sess.) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[S. Rept. No. 1819, 74th Cong., 2d sess.]

Your subcommittee heretofore appointed under authority of Senate Resolution 185, which is as follows:

"Senate Resolution 185

"Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to investigate the expenditures by the Federal Government for cotton cooperatives and their losses heretofore sustained. The committee shall report to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, the result of its investigations, together with its recommendations.

"For the purpose of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth Congress, to employ clerical and other assistants, to acquire by subpena or otherwise the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents, to administer oaths, to take testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words, and the expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $1,500, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman."

Met in the city of Memphis, Tenn., on Monday, October 28, 1935, where it proceeded to take the testimony of some eighty-odd witnesses concerning the expenditures of the cotton cooperatives and the losses of such cooperatives and other matters allied, connected with, and pertaining to such cooperatives and their losses, and having considered the same, beg leave to report to the full committee as follows:

ORGANIZATION

The American Cotton Cooperative Association is a Delaware corporation and was incorporated January 11, 1930, with an authorized capital stock of $30,000,000, of which $76,950 was paid in, $40,600 of which was capital stock, this being afterward withdrawn and returned to the marketing associations, leaving an actual net capital of $36,350 (vol. II, exhibit 25). The capital was supposed to be paid in by the cotton cooperative marketing associations under the Capper-Volstead Act (vol. I, pp. 33–34 to p. 38).

Prior to that time the cooperative marketing associations had been established under a previous act of Congress. In the 1929–30 season the A. C. C. A. handled no current cotton; it merely looked after cotton that the Government had previously acquired. The Federal Farm Board, with a $500,000,000 revolving fund created by Congress in the Agricultural Marketing Act, approved June 15, 1929, authorized the establishment of this cotton cooperative association (vol. I, p. 34).

Mr. Creekmore became associated with the American Cotton Cooperative Association in April or May 1930 (vol. I, p. 6). Previous to that time the head of the cotton cooperatives was C. O. Moser, who acted prior thereto in a similar capacity to Mr. Creekmore (vol. I, p. 402). The plan of organization was that the several marketing associations, amounting to some 14 or 15 in number, or State or regional associations, or affiliates as they have sometimes been called, became stockholders in the A. C. C. A. (vol. I, p. 34). These marketing associations, like the Mid-South at Memphis, were rather loosely formed organizations, but each one under the practical control of its managing officer. In addition to that, the managing officer was usually a member of the board of directors of the American Cotton Cooperative Association. These other cooperative associations, some 15 in number, were all more or less insolvent when the Farm Board began making loans to them at nominal rates of interest (vol. I, pp. 303–305; vol. II, exhibit 26). The names of these several State or regional marketing associations are as follows: Alabama Cotton Cooperative Association; Brazos Valley Cotton Cooperative Association; California Cotton Cooperative Association, Ltd.; Georgia Cotton Cooperative Association; Louisiana Cotton Cooperative Association; Mid-South Cotton Growers Association (Memphis); Mississippi Cooperative Cotton Association; North Carolina Cotton Growers Cooperative Cotton Association; Oklahoma Cotton Growers Association; South Carolina Cotton Cooperative Association; South Texas Cotton Cooperative Association; Southwestern Irrigated Cotton Growers Association; Texas Cotton Cooperative Association; Texas Cotton Growers Association; West Texas Cotton Growers Association.

In exhibit G to Mr. Creekmore's deposition, the common stock of these several associations, owned by the several State or regional associations, was shown as $100 each or $1,500 in all, and this indicates, in the absence of proof, that all of the $76,950 had been returned, and in lieu thereof one share of common stock had been allotted to each constituent association; so, insofar as capital invested in the A. C. C. A. is concerned, it may have been $36,350, or it may have been $1,500, or it may have been none at all. It is true that afterward preferred stock was issued, but that will be considered later. Suffice it to say that this mammoth concern had no substantial capital paid in by those who controlled it, and only a nominal capital, if any.

A. C. C. A. NOT A COTTON COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION

The A. C. C. A. and its affiliates above-named are not cotton cooperatives within the spirit and letter of the Capper-Volstead Act, or in any other sense cotton cooperatives, for the following reasons:

The commonly accepted definition of cotton coperatives, as disclosed by the undisputed evidence, is that it is an organization of cotton farmers for the purpose of selling their cotton for better prices and at a lower handling cost, and of otherwise marketing their cotton to mutual advantage, in which organization, where there are profits all the members shall share in them, and where there are losses each member will be assessed for its or his respective share of the losses. This definition is in keeping with that stated by the National Cooperative Council, of which President Williamson, of the A. C. C. A., is a member:

"Business cooperatives are created by farmers as agencies through which they collectively sell their products or purchase their supplies.

Such cooperatives, being owned and controlled by the members, should at all times have the wholehearted participation of those members in the risks, gains, and losses of the business operations. Therefore, the members, in building such cooperatives, should invest therein substantial amounts of their own funds commensurate with the needs of the business" (vol. I, p. 166).

Now, under this definition and under the proof taken by your committee, it is perfectly clear that the American Cotton Cooperative Association is in no sense, except in name, a cotton cooperative association at all. This is apparent by applying the following facts to this definition:

1. The profits are not divided equally or proportionally, even assuming that there have been profits, and this is a doubtful assumption (Henry, vol. I, pp. 204–205; vol. II, exhibit 6).

2. The losses are not made good by the so-called member (Creekmore, vol. I, pp. 18, 47, 159, 282; Williamson, vol. I, p. 330).

3. The so-called members do not invest therein substantial amounts of their own funds and have never done so (membership fee only, Cannon, vol. I, p. 458; Smith, vol. I, p. 624; Stewart, vol. I, p. 336).

4. The so-called members have not the slightest control over the marketing of their cotton (Henry, vol. I, p. 228).

5. The so-called members take no risks. The only risk taken in the business at all is the risk taken by the Government (Henry, vol. I, p. 191).

6. They do not sell collectively (vol. II, exhibit 20; Henry, vol. I, p. 205; Creekmore, vol. I, p. 157).

7. The A. C. C. A. is not owned or controlled by its so-called members (Creekmore, vol. I, pp. 155–156).

8. It is owned and controlled by its officers (Creekmore, vol. I, pp. 155–156).

9. The members are not directly responsible for losses which the cotton cooperatives may incur as a result of operations (House, vol. I, p. 492; Creekmore, vol. I, p. 47).

10. Profits, if any, have not been distributed to the individual producer members except in one instance, and even then not to the members of all the affiliated associations, during an existence of 5 years (Creekmore, vol. I, p. 26).

11. The methods of securing members are of doubtful legality and oftentimes of plain duress (Baker, vol. I, pp. 530–533; Waddell, vol. I, p. 537; Lattimer, vol. I, p. 552; Salvo, vol. I, p. 547).

12. Operating on Government money, which forms the basis of its credit, the A. C. C. A. makes loans to its affiliated associations, which have gone through an evolution as its officers claim (Hutchinson, vol. I, p. 374), whereby all cooperative features have been eliminated and the cotton cooperatives are simply operating as cotton merchants (Thompson, vol. I, p. 542; Valentine, vol. I, p. 478; Reed, vol. I, p. 483; Mitchell, vol. I, p. 544; Everett, vol. I, p. 479).

13. In dealing with its so-called members, the organization frequently resorts to what may be called duress in padding its so-called membership rolls (Creekmore, vol. I, p. 14).

14. The prices paid by the A. C. C. A. to its so-called members are not higher than those paid by private cotton merchants (Gibson, vol. I, p. 545).

15. The cost of handling is greater than when sold by private cotton merchants (Salvo, vol. I, p. 548; Henry, vol. I, p. 196).

16. The A. C. C. A. is not cooperative in fact, but is composed of a closely knit organization with an interlocking directorate largely composed of its affiliates, all of which makes it simply a cotton merchant, buying from substantially any seller at the cheapest price possible and charging the farmer a very high cost for handling his cotton (Creekmore, vol. I, pp. 155–156; Valentine, vol. I, p. 478).

17. It has no county or local organization which meets and passes on their problems and since the organization of the A. C. C. A. has not had (Everett, vol. I, p. 481).

18. It violates the Capper-Volstead Act in that it has bought more bales of "futures" than it has bought actual cotton, and "futures" were not bought from the so-called members (Creekmore, vol. I, pp. 107–109).

19. It violates the Capper-Volstead Act in that it has formed a closely knit corporation with its affiliates by which a minority of the members completely controls and dominates the other members of the association, and this is contrary to the first requirement that no member shall have more than one vote (Creekmore, vol. I, p. 155).

20. It is of no more value to the farmer than is Weil & Co., McFadden & Co., Anderson-Clayton & Co., or any other large cotton merchant (Reed, vol. I, p. 483; Sanders, vol. I, p. 486; Hermes, vol. I, p. 489).

21. Finally, in essence, it is simply the Government, acting through a few favored persons, engaging in the cotton business, competing with other private cotton merchants, sometimes putting such other merchants out of business and reducing many of them to penury and want, the Government taking continued, drastic, and almost inconceivable losses, due in many instances to gambling in cotton, without the slightest benefit to the farmer or to the Government, the only benefits going to the small coterie of officers and agents of the A. C. C. A. and its affiliates.

It is true that it was claimed that the so-called members were indirectly assessable for losses in that the American Cotton Cooperative Association and its subsidiaries had accumulated reserves which belonged to the farmer-members, one-half of which was put in a reserve fund to be used to pay such losses if such reserve fund was sufficient. In the opinion of the committee, there were no reserves and are not now any reserves and have not been any at any time.

It was undisputed that the Government had saved these cotton cooperatives in 1929 at a cost of $79,286,384.13 and had saved them again in 1933 to the extent of $27,376,998.06, and, Mr. Creekmore, the vice president and general manager, and the dominating official of that organization, testified that if the Government withdrew its support now, all operations would practically cease. His exact testimony is as follows: "I don't see how the cooperatives could continue." Under these circumstances, the reserves can at best be called, in formal banking parlance, "window dressing."

The same is even more true of the affiliated associations.

It is quite clear that the American Cotton Cooperative Association and its affiliates are not cotton cooperatives, but with the practically unlimited backing of the Federal Government constitute simply another great cotton buyer or merchant.

It may be said in closing this paragraph that the business and operation of the American Cotton Cooperative Association not only violates the definition of cotton cooperatives heretofore stated, but it is in no sense such a cooperative association as is provided for in the Capper-Volstead Act under which it was organized.

INTERLOCKING DIRECTORATES

Six of the managing directors of six of the State organizations are also directors of the American Cotton Cooperative Association. Half of the salaries of these six directors are paid by the central organization of the A. C. C. A. These are: C. C. Selden, California association; W. R. Squires, Southwestern Irrigated Association; P. E. Harrill, Oklahoma association; A. D. Stewart, Mississippi association; J. A. Beatty, Alabama association; J. S. Hathcock, South Carolina association.

To these six must be added Mr. N. C. Williamson, of the Louisiana association, who receives no salary, but a per diem of $25 is paid him, also Mr. Charles G. Henry, of the Mid-South Association at Memphis, who does not draw a salary from the A. C. C. A., but who is one of the directors, and it is easy to see from his testimony and from Mr. Creekmore's testimony the close cooperation between them (vol. I. p. 155).

The other six directors seem to be beyond the pale and certainly have no potential vote, as they receive no salary either from the central association or their own organizations (vol. I, p. 156).

It thus appears that the American Cotton Cooperative Association constitutes, with its affiliates, a close corporation managed solely for the benefit of the central association and the officers and employees of the favored members of its directorate.

MEMBERSHIP

The officers of the cotton cooperatives claim that their membership in the United States in these 15 associations numbers 259,000.

A list of the members was requested by the committee, but the same was refused unless the committee would keep it confidential. Although the committee called for a complete list, it was furnished with a list of only two associations—that of the Mid-South and the Mississippi Cotton Cooperative Associations. The list of the two associations was accepted but has not been opened (Creekmore, vol. I, p. 172). However, there was much evidence concerning membership. That evidence is practically undisputed.

Through the fiction of the immediate fixation pool, which is in effect an outright purchase of cotton by the cotton cooperatives, they sign up as a member every individual who sells them a bale or more of cotton and the bulk of their deliveries are secured through this immediate fixation pool.

Many years before the organization of the A. C. C. A., it seems there were associations formed in various cotton localities of the United States. Since the A. C. C. A. came into existence, there have been few members obtained except under what may be termed substantial duress. Since the organization of the A. C. C. A., they have come to adopt the following methods in obtaining members: Whenever a bale or a number of bales of cotton were delivered to the cotton cooperatives, there was included in the bill of sale, and afterward in the check by which the cotton was paid for, a statement to the effect that the seller or deliverer, by reason of his bill of sale, and of his receipt of the money, became a member of the cooperative association (Baker, vol. I, pp. 530–531; Black, vol. I, p. 437).

To put it in the language of one of the witnesses, after the purchase was made and everything completed except the delivery of the money, the seller would be informed by the cotton cooperatives' agent that he would be paid only by the statement in writing that he was a member, and if he dealt for others, that by the signing of the draft he made his principals members of the cooperative association.

A membership obtained in this way, in the opinion of the committee, is substantial coercion, and it is exceedingly doubtful if by any such proceeding membership in the organization could be legally or morally brought about. In the absence of local organizations where members met, and in the absence of any meeting for consideration of the cotton cooperatives' problems, it is perfectly apparent that such a membership is not real in any sense and doesn't make the seller of the cotton a member at all, although he states in his bill of sale or check that he becomes a member.

The fact is, however, that the undisputed evidence shows that with a few exceptions in certain counties in Mississippi and Greer County, Okla., and perhaps one or two more, there are no local organizations of cotton cooperatives anywhere, and even in Mississippi, judging from the testimony of the head of the A. C. C. A. in that State, whatever organizations there are were controlled by the same cotton cooperative association (Windle, vol. I, p. 367; Orr, vol. I, p. 592; Garner, vol. I, p. 604).

The proof shows that the actual membership of the organization is largely confined to those in the employ of the A. C. C. A. and its affiliates. While the membership was challenged time and again, the cotton cooperatives made no effort to show an actual membership except in the way above stated, and while the record is not at all clear, your subcommittee believes that the actual membership in the association amounts to only a few interested people.

FINANCIAL STRUCTURE

The original financial structure of the American Cotton Cooperative Association is exceedingly interesting. The evidence of the cotton cooperatives was that $30,000,000 was the authorized capital, of which $800,000 was subscribed, and of this amount only $79,950 was actually paid in, as stated. Of the $76,950 paid in cash, the A. C. C. A. refunded in cash payments of the Oklahoma and other of the affiliated associations in the aggregate sum of $40,600, so the actual paid-in capital was $36,350; however, the revolving fund of $500,000,000 had been set up by the Hoover administration to be loaned the farmers, and it seems that a capital of $36,350 was ample to get a Government loan.

When the A. C. C. A. was organized, and put under the direction of Mr. Creekmore, all of the cooperatives were in financial straits, and the most of them were in actual bankruptcy, as testified to by Mr. Legge, the then Chairman of the Farm Board, in January of 1931.

The first operation of the A. C. C. A. after its organization in 1930, was the Cotton Stabilization Corporation. By this operation, 1,300,000 bales, in round numbers, of cotton owned by the A. C. C. A. and its affiliates were sold to the Cotton Stabilization Corporation, and that corporation agreed to hold the cotton at its original cost, plus charges, for the purpose of holding it off the market and to keep the various cotton cooperatives out of bankruptcy (Creekmore, vol. I, p. 34).

This Stabilization Corporation was a Delaware corporation, but its officers, agents, and offices were the same officers, agents, and offices as those of the American Cotton Cooperative Association. This was a matter of bookkeeping and of high finance, and in a short time about $80,000,000 was lost (Creekmore, vol. I, pp. 34–36).

Your committee will now consider these several losing operations of the American Cotton Cooperative Association.

THE STABILIZATION CORPORATION AND THE 16-CENT LOAN

The first major operation with regard to cotton after the Agricultural Marketing Act was passed on May 15, 1929, was the formation of the Stabilization Corporation and the 16-cent loan, taken together.

The Stabilization Corporation was organized in May of 1930, with an authorized capital stock of $15,000,000, all of which was advanced from the revolving fund of the Farm Board (Creekmore, vol. I, p. 35). The first major operation with regard to cotton was announced by the Federal Farm Board on October 21, 1929. Exactly 10 days before this announcement, Mr. C. O. Moser, the then president and general manager of the American Cotton Growers Exchange (the central cotton-cooperative organization which preceded the American Cotton Cooperative Association), wrote a long letter to Mr. Carl Williams, cotton member of the Federal Farm Board, in which Mr. Moser urged the adoption of 16-cent loan as the joint policy of the cotton cooperatives and the Farm Board.

The price of cotton steadily declined, and by the early spring of 1930, the cotton cooperatives were again confronted with bankruptcy. The losses, according to Mr. Creekmore's estimate, of the A. C. C. A. in its Stabilization Corporation and 16-cent loan, amounted to the enormous sum of $79,286,384.13. The Stabilization Corporation not only had this 1,300,000 bales of actual cotton, but it also had a large number of bales of futures which had been acquired from time to time.

THE DOLLAR AND A HALF PER BALE LOANS

Although the Stabilization Corporation took over the 16-cent loan cotton at the amount of the loan, plus carrying charges, it was discovered that liens of private banks and balances due farmer members had to be paid before the Government could acquire title to the cotton. In order to do this, the Stabilization Corporation assumed $2,462,351.81 as an added cost of the cotton, and the Farm Board loaned the cotton cooperatives $1.50 per bale, in the aggregate sum of $1,704,047.46.

Incidentally, the funds loaned under the $1.50-per-bale plan were lost by the Government in making compromise settlements of indebtedness with the Oklahoma, South Carolina, and Alabama cooperatives. Thus for the second time within a few weeks the Government produced funds to save the cotton cooperatives from bankruptcy.

THE 90-PERCENT ADVANCE

Despite the efforts of the cotton cooperatives and the Farm Board, the price of cotton continued to decline; whereupon in August 1930 the cotton cooperatives and the Farm Board entered into an agreement whereby the members of the cotton cooperatives would be advanced 90 percent of the market price of cotton at the time of delivery (Creekmore, vol. I, p. 37). Although Mr. Creekmore testified at the agricultural conference and Farm Board inquiry in 1931 that he entered into the plan with a full realization of its hazards, he stated that he was optimistic as to its ultimate outcome (Creekmore, agricultural conference and Farm Board inquiry, p. 310).

The facts are that this operation again rendered the cotton cooperatives bankrupt, and in order to rescue them, the Government in 1933 had to assume another loss, which Mr. Creekmore testified amounted to $27,376,998.06 (Creekmore, vol. I, p. 37). According to Mr. Creekmore, he estimates that the losses on the two transactions (the 16-cent loan of 1929–30 and the 90-percent advance of 1930–31) aggregated $107,113,441.54 (Creekmore, vol. I, p. 37). However, Mr. Creekmore's estimate is based on his exception to the statutory allowances made for the cotton donated to the Red Cross. The actual loss sustained by the Government on the two transactions has been approximately $140,000,000.

THE FRAZIER BILL

Senate Joint Resolution 38, introduced by Senator LYNN FRAZIER, of North Dakota, proposes a reopening of the settlements made by the Farm Board with the wheat and cotton cooperatives on the theory that the various stabilization operations were done on the authority of the Farm Board, which made the cooperatives, both wheat and cotton, its unwilling agents in carrying out these operations.

As far as the cotton cooperatives are concerned, such an argument is not sound, because the 16-cent loan was made at the earnest solicitation of and on the basis suggested by the cotton cooperatives; and by Mr. Creekmore's own admission he entered into the 90-percent loan with a full realization of its hazards but with the hope it would work out eventually.

Now, it must be remembered that Mr. C. O. Moser was the predecessor of Mr. Creekmore, he being president of the American Cotton Growers Exchange. The evidence discloses an announcement by the Farm Board on October 21, 1929, as follows:

"The Federal Farm Board believes that the prevailing prices for cotton are too low * * *. The Board will make supplemental loans to the cooperatives in amounts sufficient to make the average loan total 16 cents per pound."

Just 10 days prior to this announcement, Mr. C. O. Moser, president of the American Cotton Growers Exchange (which was the predecessor of the A. C. C. A.), wrote a long letter to Mr. Carl Williams, the cotton member of the Federal Farm Board, setting out the conditions as he saw them in reference to cotton, and strongly urging the Farm Board order just set out above.

Among other things, Mr. Moser said:

"It is therefore at a time like this that it is possible for us to advance nearer the market price than it would have been earlier in the season, when the size of the crop is less a calculable thing than it is now. I believe the cotton cooperatives, with the aid of the Farm Board may, with safety, and they should immediately, advance 16 cents a pound, or $80 a bale, on unfixed cotton, basis ⅞-inch Middling; and that wide publicity to such advance should be given as being the joint program of the cotton cooperatives and the Farm Board, and that the difference between 65 percent advanced at the time of delivery and the $80 a bale should be paid as soon as weight and grade of the cotton is established" (Creekmore, vol. I, p. 34; Williams, vol. I, p. 399 through to 402).

The evidence discloses that the cotton cooperatives and the Federal Farm Board were consulting daily just prior to the issuance of the Farm Board order, and no person who was then connected with either the Farm Board or the cotton cooperatives has testified to the contrary.

Mr. Stone, the tobacco member of the Farm Board, who was put on the stand by the cotton cooperatives, testified that there were daily conferences. It is apparent from the evidence that this order of the Board, if not directly secured by the cotton cooperatives, was issued with the full knowledge, consent, and approval of the cotton cooperatives, and issued at the earnest solicitation of the cotton cooperatives (Stone, vol. I, p. 570). Copy of this Moser letter was sent to all members of the regional or State cotton cooperatives (Creekmore, vol. I, p. 522).

Shortly after this operation began, the price of cotton began to go down. Within 6 months it had dropped from 18.23 cents per pound to 12.41 cents per pound and continued to drop. The cotton cooperatives' loss on this cotton was something like $79,000,000 on the 16-cent loan (Creekmore, vol. I, p. 35).

In view of the Moser letter, relating to the 16-cent loan, and Mr. Creekmore's statements at the agricultural conference and Farm Board inquiry, and his letter to Mr. Carl Williams, under date of November 16, 1932, with regard to the 90-percent loan, the Frazier bill must fail as far as cotton cooperatives are concerned.

It will thus be seen that every attempt of the cotton cooperatives backed by the Farm Board to benefit the farmers by increasing their prices in these various ways was a failure; however, each one, it was developed, was advertised to the whole country as a panacea for the low price of cotton, with the result that not only were the cotton cooperatives, then controlling about 15 percent of the cotton, rendered bankrupt, but the mills and the dealers and the farmers were all affected in the same way and their losses were tremendous.

These outside farmers and outside dealers and mills handled 85 percent of the cotton, and of course 85 percent of the loss fell on them, and neither the old Farm Board nor the cotton cooperatives was of any value or aid in the stabilization of the price of cotton, notwithstanding the enormous sums of money that were used in the various operations.

A year or two ago a bill was introduced by Senator FRAZIER of North Dakota which provided that the settlement of the Farm Board with wheat cooperatives be reopened for the purpose of giving the wheat farmers an opportunity of showing that their cooperative losses were the result of the action of the Farm Board and not of the cooperatives.

Later on another bill was introduced in which cotton was added, and that bill has been pending in Congress for some time. The bill provided as follows:

[S. J. Res. 38, April 15, 1935]

Joint resolution for the adjustment and settlement of losses sustained by the cooperative marketing associations

Resolved, etc., That for the purpose of adjustment and settlement of losses sustained by the cooperative marketing associations dealing in grain during the stabilization operations of the Federal Farm Board in the years 1929 and 1930, when such cooperative marketing associations were induced and requested by the Federal Farm Board to withhold grain and/or cotton from the market and to make advances to their members in order to stabilize prices, the Federal Farm Credit Administration is hereby authorized and directed to make such adjustments and settlements in accordance with the understanding that such cooperative marketing associations had with the Federal Farm Board, and on the basis of a price or a sum equal to the amount directly loaned or advanced to such associations, plus carrying charges and operation costs in connection with such grain and/or cotton from the date of the loans or advances to the date that such grain and/or cotton was finally taken over by the Federal Farm Board or delivered pursuant to its instructions.

This bill has been delayed in the Senate from time to time.

It is perfectly apparent from the facts brought out in the investigation that the cotton cooperatives, through Mr. Moser, the predecessor of Mr. Creekmore, recommended this loan and urged the Farm Board to adopt it, and after they had urged such adoption they cannot now be heard to say that further losses by them should be paid by the Farm Board or by the Government.

It was also developed in the hearings that this claim for a reopening of the settlements heretofore made by the Farm Board with the cotton cooperatives was first made by Mr. Creekmore on the 16th day of November 1932, when he wrote Mr. Carl Williams, cotton member of the Farm Board, making the claim that the cotton cooperatives were entitled to certain losses which they sustained on the 16-cent cotton (Stone, vol. I, p. 573).

It is perfectly apparent, therefore, that Mr. Moser, the predecessor of Mr. Creekmore, acting for the cotton cooperatives, having in like manner recommended the settlement between the Government and the cotton cooperatives on the 16-cent loan, the cotton cooperatives are now bound by the action taken by Mr. Moser as set out in his letter. The letter of Mr. Moser was sent to all of the cotton cooperatives (Creekmore, vol. I, p. 522).

Besides, in the memorandum put in the record by Mr. Creekmore, he states:

"After many conferences regarding a settlement, a compromise agreement was reached in May 1930 by a representative of the cooperatives with the chairman of the Farm Board, in the presence of the Vice Chairman, the cotton member, and the general counsel of the Board; whereby the cooperatives were to be reimbursed by a stabilization corporation, to be later organized, on the basis of the loan value on all cotton on hand, plus carrying charges, plus $1 per bale overhead on deliveries received during the 1929 season" (Stone, vol. I, p. 578).

This agreement was disapproved by the Attorney General and later on a settlement was made as follows:

"The general basis of settlement, as finally worked out by the Farm Board, resulted in the Cotton Stabilization Corporation taking over the cooperatives' cotton on the basis of the loan value, with an allowance of not to exceed $2.50 per bale for carrying charges, payable only to the extent necessary to meet the obligations of the cooperatives after borrowing from the Farm Board $1.50 per bale listed on prior seasons' deliveries. This loan was to be repaid by deductions of 50 cents per bale from the members' proceeds on deliveries in future years" (Stone, vol. I, p. 578).

UNDER THE NEW ADMINISTRATION

The foregoing is a history of the operations of the cotton cooperatives with the Farm Board up until March 4, 1933. The Congress meeting that year repealed the Farm Board Act and passed what is known as the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which set up the Farm Credit Administration in place of the Farm Board. At that time the cotton cooperatives owed the Government $207,418,246.48. (See McNary report, p. 35.)

At that time cotton was worth somewhere around 5 or 6 cents a pound, and the Farm Board, which had had appropriations to be used as a revolving fund of $500,000,000, and the A. C. C. A. had been financed by the Farm Board, were all in a state of bankruptcy and their debts had to be assumed by the Government, amounting to $27,376,993.06, as outlined in the 90-percent-loan loss. Also, the State associations benefited under the terms of the A. A. A. adjustment by additional payments authorized by Congress in connection with the settlement of the 1930–31 operations. Seven hundred and thirty-two thousand four hundred and fifty-six dollars and eighty-seven cents were paid in this adjustment (S. Rept. No. 1456, p. 22).

In other words, the new administration of Mr. Roosevelt started off by wiping the slate clean and taking over all the cotton into what was known as the Oscar Johnson pool. Thus the cotton cooperatives were again saved from bankruptcy and the Government, through Mr. Johnson, took over about 1,300,000 bales of actual cotton and approximately another million bales of futures which the A. C. C. A. had gathered in during the years of their speculation.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION

The Government continued to loan money to the cotton cooperatives, but under the provisions of the A. A. A., acreage was reduced through voluntary action, and Government rentals on land not cultivated in cotton were established.

Then the Bankhead Act was passed to regulate the number of bales produced.

Also the processing tax was put on to pay the cotton farmer for the rentals on land not used in producing cotton.

The above three enactments, passed in 1933, did what the Farm Board and the cotton cooperatives had tried in vain to accomplish since July 1929; namely, the price of cotton began to rise and the general trend has been upward ever since.

In March 1933 cotton was selling at between 5 and 6 cents a pound. By July 1933 cotton had risen to 9½ cents. By September 1933 it was 10 cents. By January 1934 it was 11½ cents, and by March 1934 it was 12½ cents. In July 1934 it was 13.15 cents.

In the fall of 1933, under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, Secretary Wallace announced a Government loan of 10 cents a pound on cotton, and this operated throughout the year 1933–34.

In August 1934 that loan was increased to 12 cents. The 10-cent loan did not seem to interfere with the movement of cotton. Indeed, it was under that loan that the price went from 10 to 13 cents, and it was thought that if the Government made a loan of 12 cents it would still further increase the price, but it did not have that effect and cotton went down some in 1934 and 1935, and in the summer of 1935 the loan offered by the Government was reduced again to 10 cents. Cotton is now selling at figures ranging from 11½ cents to 12½ cents.

This is the history of what has been done under the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

THE A. C. C. A. UNDER THE A. A. A.

Under the Agricultural Adjustment Act the A. C. C. A. has continued to borrow money from the Government; however, it and its affiliates have from time to time discarded practically all of their cooperative features until now, through their central organization, the cotton cooperatives have become one of the largest cotton dealers in the country.

It will be remembered that Mr. Creekmore testified that the cotton cooperatives and affiliates would have failed in 1929 and 1930 and that they would have been bankrupt if the Government had not assumed their debts. He testified that again in 1933 the A. C. C. A. and its affiliates were bankrupt and would have gone into bankruptcy if the Government had not assumed their debts (Creekmore, vol. I, p. 16).

He also testified that at the present time without Government subsidies and bounties they could not continue to operate (Creekmore, vol. I, pp. 120–121).

THE A. C. C. A. UNDER THE ROOSEVELT ADMINISTRATION

The cotton cooperatives, under the present administration, have undergone what one witness described as an "evolution." No longer do they advance money to their producer members on his cotton which is pooled with other cotton of like description and character. By means of the immediate fixation pool, the cotton cooperatives buy cotton just as any other merchant does, and the immediate fixation pool is simply a fiction whereby they can make outright purchases.

Under the present administration the A. C. C. A. has made, or claims to have made, approximately $2,500,000 from the handling of cotton owned or controlled by the Government, but during the same period it has lost about $1,500,000 on its operations for its own account.

INTEREST RATES AND PROFITS

But the Government continued to lend money to the cooperatives in 1933 and 1934 at ridiculously low rates of interest, and they were relending the money to their affiliates at a much higher rate of interest and making great profits thereby (Creekmore, vol. I, pp. 52–53). They also made profits from the handling of the old stabilization corporation cotton and in the 10-cent loan and in the 12-cent loan, and also on what is known as the Oscar Johnston pool cotton, which was the cotton accumulated by the A. C. C. A. under the 90-percent advance in 1930–31. They now claim to have made very substantial profits in 1933–34, that they had losses in 1934–35, and for the present it isn't clear whether they are making money now or not.

The American Cotton Cooperative Association borrowed money from the Government under a joker statute—that is to say, at rates of interest ranging from one-eighth of 1 percent to 1¾ percent. A statute had been passed by the Congress allowing money to be loaned to farmers at the same rate of interest that the Government paid for money.

The purpose of this statute was this: At the time of its passage the Government was borrowing money on its bonds at from one-eighth of 1 percent to 1¾ percent and the Congress did not wish to have the farmer charged any more for the money than the Government was paying for it; however, Mr. Andrew Mellon was Secretary of the Treasury at the time and he gave this statute a different construction from that intended by the Congress. He held that the lowest rate of interest meant any low rate, and he had been borrowing money on some classes of temporary certificates at as low as one-eighth of 1 percent; therefore, the farmers got some of their money at rates of interest as low as one-eighth of 1 percent. This was never intended by the Congress and when the matter came out, an act was promptly passed allowing the cooperatives to borrow money at 3 percent. As long as this statute was on the books, however, it seems that the American Cotton Cooperative Association borrowed money from the Government, of course, but when the new statute of 3 percent was passed, Mr. Creekmore looked about to see if he couldn't get the money at a small rate and he made an agreement with the Chase National and other banks in New York to borrow the money at 1⅛ percent (Creekmore, vol. I, p. 53).

FINANCIAL OPERATIONS

Mr. Creekmore testified that the cotton cooperatives had a line of credit with the Farm Credit Administration of about fifteen and one-half millions of dollars, and that he had a line of credit with private banks of something like $75,000,000, and that he had actually borrowed in 1 year $55,000,000. This Government credit, coupled with a practice by the Washington office of subordinating the Government loans to private loans, brought about an immense change in the cotton cooperatives' business.

The cotton cooperatives gave up their seasonal pools and their optional pools and their long-time holding of cotton and began what Mr. Creekmore termed the "immediate fixation pool," and the proof clearly shows that the immediate fixation pool is nothing in the world but a purchase of the cotton from the farmer by the cotton cooperatives.

It is true that it was claimed that they held out to the farmer when they bought his cotton that if there was any profit made by the cotton cooperatives the member would later receive what was called a patronage dividend. It developed that only one patronage dividend had been declared in 5 years, and that patronage dividend was 56 cents per bale in some districts, notably in Mississippi.

In one district, notably in Tennessee and Arkansas, the patronage dividend was credited on a debt due by the Mid-South (Henry, vol. I, p. 205).

It is very clear that when the farmer sold his cotton and when the cooperatives purchased his cotton under the so-called immediate fixation pool, the farmer regarded it as a sale and the cotton cooperatives regarded it as a purchase, and the American Cotton Cooperative Association and its affiliates became nothing but a huge cotton-buying concern with Government aid.

The so-called patronage dividend might well be likened to a transaction by which when a person enters a drug store or any other store and buys an article he is frequently given a coupon with his purchase, with the statement on the coupon that when the purchaser gets a million coupons he will be entitled to a prize box of candy.

This patronage dividend did not deceive the farmers at all, as appears from the proof, because they never expected to get anything further; but apparently it has deceived the executives in charge of the Farm Credit Administration up to this time.

ALADDIN'S LAMP

The Federal Government has been a veritable financial Aladdin's lamp to the American Cotton Cooperative Association. When the cotton cooperatives could borrow money from the Government at from one-half of 1 percent to 1 percent interest and lend it out to their subordinates at from 5 to 6 percent, this was pretty easy financial picking. When the Congress passed the 3-percent loan, however, it was necessary to do some refinancing, and then the plan was adopted to borrow from private banks at 1 11/16 percent, with the Government at Washington subordinating its liens to those of the private banks. By what right the Government at Washington did this has not been disclosed, but it was done, and the cooperatives borrowed as much as $55,000,000 in 1 year, with the Government's liens on the cotton made subordinate to those of the private banks.

Even with all this money, the American Cotton Cooperative Association had to have working capital, and how to get it was the next problem. The private banks would not lend to them at 1 11/16 percent unless the Government subordinated its liens. The Government, in the second year, decided it would not subordinate its liens, and thereupon the following plan was adopted: The A. C. C. A. in some manner that has not been fully explained caused its State associations, each one individually, to borrow from the Farm Credit Administration sums aggregating $5,000,000, to be turned over to the American Cotton Cooperative Association, and the State associations to receive preferred stock in the American Cotton Cooperative Association for the money (Daley, vol. I, p. 93).

In other words the American Cotton Cooperative Association did not borrow the money and, remarkable to tell, the individual State associations borrowed this money and took stock in the American Cotton Cooperative Association for it.

Exhibit C to Mr. Creekmore's testimony shows that the following companies borrowed from the Farm Credit Administration the $5,000,000 and turned it over to the A. C. C. A.:

Alabama Cotton Cooperative Association	$400,000
Brazos Valley Cotton Cooperative Association	425,000
California Cotton Cooperative Association	175,000
Louisiana Cotton Cooperative Association	800,000
Mid-South Cotton Growers' Association	800,000
Mississippi Cooperative Cotton Association	800,000
Oklahoma Cotton Growers' Association	500,000
South Carolina Cotton Growers' Association	200,000
South Texas Cotton Cooperative Association	200,000
Southwestern Irrigated Cotton Growers	200,000
West Texas Cotton Growers' Association	500,000

Now, let's analyze these transactions.

The Alabama Cotton Cooperative Association had been wound up in receivership, and of course it is inconceivable that the Government would lend to this bankrupt concern $400,000.

The Brazos Valley Cotton Cooperative Association had no assets of any kind and this was admitted by its officers (McCrary, vol. I, p. 356).

The California Cotton Cooperative Association, Ltd., there was no proof about.

The Georgia Cotton Cooperative Association is now being wound up through a receivership (Creekmore, vol. I, p. 9; Williams, vol. I, p. 386).

The Louisiana Cotton Cooperative Association, there was no evidence concerning ($365,000 stock in A. C. C. A.; Williams, vol. I, p. 291).

The Mid-South Cotton Growers' Association has quite a history. It had failed in 1929 and was in an expiring condition when the Government lent money to it. It is true that Mr. Henry, its manager, stated in his testimony that the Mid-South had $100,000 of Government bonds and $100,000 in cash and a building that he had bought for $35,000, and that it had some equities in the stock of the A. C. C. A. in stock dividends, but taking all these, it wasn't in a financial condition to borrow $800,000 and the Government will probably not get 10 percent of its loan back from the Mid-South (Henry, vol. I, p. 205).

The Mississippi Cotton Cooperative Association is supposed to be a going concern, but its assets were not disclosed (about $360,000; Stewart, vol. I, p. 342).

The Oklahoma Cotton Growers' Association had recently been sold by the Government, lock, stock, and barrel to the A. C. C. A. itself, and the Government had lost something like half a million dollars by it, and yet this bankrupt concern was allowed by the Commodity Credit Corporation to borrow $500,000 and invest it in the stock of the A. C. C. A. (Creekmore, vol. I, pp. 27–29).

The South Carolina Association likewise had to compromise its affairs at a great loss to the Government (McCutcheon, vol. I, p. 152).

The South Texas Association, its assets were not disclosed.

The Texas Cotton Cooperative Association, its assets were not disclosed.

The West Texas Cotton Growers' Association admitted that they had no assets of any kind (Lee, vol. I, p. 361).

Thus we see that the enormous sum of $5,000,000 was loaned by the Government to the several associations, none of which were able to borrow any such sums with any expectation of paying them back, and none of which borrowed for themselves, but for the benefit of the A. C. C. A.

The whole transaction, in the opinion of your subcommittee, was a fraud upon the Government.

What was the purpose of this transaction? Although the A. C. C. A. had failed twice, costing the Government something like $140,000,000, and although it admits that it is now insolvent unless the Government continues its aid, yet it claims to have put some $4,000,000 in reserve and issued stock therefor, and that it has a line of credit, as testified to by Mr. Creekmore, of $15,500,000 with the Farm Credit Administration, and $75,000,000 with private banks; and under these circumstances the question naturally arises: Why did the A. C. C. A. have to erect this amazingly peculiar financial structure in order to obtain working capital?

It is the opinion of your subcommittee that these loans are virtually worthless and the Government will be unable to collect them.

THE COOPERATIVES AND THE SEED-LOAN BORROWERS

The Congress having passed a law that cooperatives should be encouraged in every way possible, the Federal Farm Credit Administration recommended that the seed-loan cotton should be turned over as far as possible to the cotton cooperatives, and this was done.

And look at the charges that were made: $1.30 per bale other than seasonal charges. What they were nobody knows; $5 for membership fee; 50 cents for a newspaper publication (Henry, vol. I, pp. 197 through 202).

These charges were unconscionable and indefensible. Take the poor seed-loan borrower who can get credit nowhere else to make a crop, who was the poorest of the poor, and who in order to maintain himself and family had to borrow the pitifully small sum that he was allowed to borrow from the seed-loan office; and think of charges other than storage, insurance, and interest, mounting up to him of more than $11 per bale—more than 13 percent of the value of the cotton—taken out of the cotton for this enormous trust in the cotton-buying business known as the American Cotton Cooperative Association (Henry, vol. I, p. 232).

To my mind, the most condemning fact brought out was the treatment of the seed-loan borrower by the A. C. C. A. and its affiliates.

GOVERNMENT BOUNTY AND FAVORITISM

Remember that the American Cotton Cooperative Association has been in existence for 5 years.

The following sums have been paid to the American Cotton Cooperative Association by the Government on Government-controlled cotton as services and expenses, by years:

1930–31	$531,710.32
1931–32	907,909.87
1932–33	883,032.84
1933–34	789,060.65
1934–35	724,499.33

Totaling $3,836,213.01, or an average per year of $767,499.33.

All of this is obtained from Mr. Creekmore's exhibit Q and his testimony.

It is true that expenses apportioned to the Stabilization Corporation out of the above amounted to $1,278,967.43, but since that corporation was officered and serviced by exactly the same people as the American Cotton Cooperative Association, that was a mere matter of bookkeeping (Creekmore, vol. 2, p. 215).

Over and above this income the A. C. C. A. made enormous sums out of interest annually by charging the member associations more than they paid the Government for the money. The interest sheets have not yet been furnished, but Mr. Creekmore says he will furnish them and the amount that the Government gave them under interest transactions will be shown and made a part of this paragraph. Over and above the income which the American Cotton Cooperative Association made, the affiliated associations made additional interest on the loans made by them to individual members (Creekmore, vol. I, p. 57).

In other words, the farmer paid the bill, except when there was a loss, and kindly Congress assumed these enormous losses.

RECONCENTRATION OF COTTON

Much of the $3,836,213.01 was for reconcentrating and otherwise handling Government cotton. But last spring or early summer another reconcentration of cotton was ordered. Announcements were made by the Federal Farm Credit Administration that bids would be received for reconcentration of cotton on which the Government had a lien, for the purpose of making room for the new cotton crop of 1935–36. It was estimated that it would be necessary to reconcentrate some 3,000,000 of bales. Bids were put in to do this handling by the A. C. C. A. by John M. Parker & Co., of New Orleans, and others.

Mr. Parker testified that they put in a bid to reconcentrate this cotton for 40 cents per bale flat (Parker, vol. I, p. 495).

The A. C. C. A. put in a bid for reconcentrating the first 500,000 bales at 48 cents; the second 500,000 at 45 cents; the third 500,000 at 40 cents; and any additional bales for 35 cents (Parker, vol. I, pp. 498-499).

Up to the time of the hearing only 1,600,000 bales had been reconcentrated. Whether there would have been any more was not known. But it must be remembered that the A. C. C. A. had received 48 cents a bale on the first 500,000 bales, 45 cents on the second 500,000 bales, and 40 cents on the third 500,000 bales—and then they handled very little more. So that the average price of handling the cotton was more than 43 cents per bale, while Mr. Parker offered to reconcentrate the cotton for 40 cents per bale, and if the Parker bid had been accepted—and he represented a responsible firm—the Government would have saved some fifty to seventy thousand dollars by giving the bid to him. But the A. C. C. A. got the job.

Some question was raised as to whether the Department had the right to let this contract without advertising for bids. No bids were advertised for.

In connection with this reconcentration of cotton Mr. R. L. Taylor, president of the Federal Compress Co., which warehouses the cotton in the Memphis district, or a large part of it, stated that he offered to reconcentrate all of the cotton in his district necessary to be reconcentrated without charge. The bid to do it for nothing was declined (Taylor, vol. I, p. 420).

Mr. Parker testified that the reconcentration of this cotton was very expensive to the farmer, and this testimony was not in any way denied (Parker, vol. I, p. 502).

When the cotton goes in the warehouse it is sampled, and when it was reconcentrated the Government required it to be sampled again, and by regulation these second samples were destroyed so far as the use of them was concerned; but it was said that the A. C. C. A. credited the value of them to the Federal Farm Credit Administration. However, Mr. Parker testified that when the cotton is sold it must again be sampled.

Now, the amount taken out at each one of these sampling operations ranges from three-quarters of a pound to a pound, and thus the farmer is deprived of these three samples, at the present price of cotton, on 3 to 35 cents per bale (Parker, vol. I, p. 501).

In addition to that, when the cotton is sold under the third sampling the cost of that sample is from 35 to 50 cents.

It will thus be seen that the reconcentration movement cost the farmer something like 65 to 75 cents per bale. But what is the poor farmer if he is not to be mulcted in this way? Who cares for him, anyhow?

In addition to that, quite frequently the cotton was moved from warehouse to other points hundreds of miles away, without the consent of the farmer, without the knowledge of the farmer, and how much delay and expense he may be put to to find his cotton in some far-off warehouse is yet to be seen.

In connection with this last reconcentration of cotton, Southern Senators, almost to a Senator, and many Southern cotton Congressmen, protested as vigorously as they knew how against this reconcentration of cotton. There was in their opinion no reason for it. It is doubtful if there was any reason for it, and the only one to benefit by it was the cotton cooperatives, and the only ones to lose by it will be the farmers—unless the loss is so great that the Government will have to come forward for a third time and assume it.

FUTURES AND SPECULATION

The committee has tried very zealously to obtain figures on the total number of bales of futures that were bought or sold during the existence of the cotton cooperatives. Mr. Creekmore said it was very difficult to get these figures, but exhibits H and I of his deposition indicate the amounts that he paid the futures brokers for 2 years, namely, for 1931–32 and 1932–33. For these 2 years, commissions alone amounted to $1,246,815.24 (Creekmore, vol. I, pp. 108–109).

Each year shows futures brokers' total commissions, being separated into two divisions, namely, "Brokers' commissions" and "Brokers' commissions earned." What is meant is not shown.

The figure of $1,246,815.24 shown above constitutes commissions on some 8 million plus bales of futures based on the brokerage as testified to, of 15 cents a bale. In other words, the cotton futures dealt in by the cotton cooperatives must have been many times the number of bales of spot cotton dealt in by them. Speculation at one time was freely admitted, and, of course, cannot be denied.

COMPARISON OF CHARGES

It is undeniable, and for a large part undisputed, that the charges for handling cotton, and collected out of the cotton by the cooperatives, are considerably larger than similar charges made by private merchants and buyers. No better illustration of these charges can be given than the following typical statement from the seed-loan office:

KENNETH MCKELLAR.
JOHN G. TOWNSEND, Jr.

ORDER FOR CONSIDERATION OF CALENDAR TOMORROW

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think the Senate might well recess at this time until tomorrow. I ask the Senator from Kentucky whether or not he is agreeable to recessing at this time and permitting me to continue in the morning.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, on Monday I announced to the Senate that we should endeavor to call the calendar tomorrow. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate convenes tomorrow the pending unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to a call of the calendar for the consideration of unobjected-to bills, after which the consideration of the unfinished business will be resumed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, APRIL 9, 1940

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Merciful Father, grant that we may welcome this new day as Thy gift—taking up our duties and following the light which Thou dost give us. Conscious of the meaning and the purpose of life, may we consecrate ourselves anew to a strong, courageous, adventurous faith, realizing that we enter into fellowship with all who have been workers together with Thee. As Thou hast been interpreted by the glorified cross, O make it real to all hearts. By accepting the Christ, we accept the life He lived, making His aims and ambitions our own; exalted when inspired by Him, love and faith in Him make the perfect man. Today guide our feet in the way of Thy commandments and fill our souls with Thy presence. We praise Thee that Thou art the Lord of life and Thy life is the light of men. We thank Thee and complain not—in the name of our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 255

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
April 8, 1940.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. CLYDE H. SMITH, late a Representative from the State of Maine.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative the Senate do now take a recess until 12 o'clock meridian tomorrow.

The message also announced that pursuant to the foregoing resolution the presiding officer had appointed Mr. HALE and Mr. WHITE as the members of said committee on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 8913. An act making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

THE LATE CLYDE H. SMITH

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAYBURN). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my colleagues in expressing a profound sense of personal, as well as public, loss in the passing of Representative CLYDE H. SMITH.

Far more than a perfunctory tribute is the due of Representative CLYDE H. SMITH of the Second Maine Congressional District, who has completed his labors after a most extraordinary career.

Forty-nine times he submitted himself to the suffrage of his fellow citizens, and every time his record brought him merited success.

Rarely, if ever, has such a record been duplicated in the entire history of American democracy.

Not only in the duration of his service, but also in its variety, his record is unique: Selectman of a New England town, with all the exacting requirements of daily contact with the myriad interests he must serve; superintendent of schools in the days when it had not yet become a position for professionals but was still the task of a layman who took seriously his community responsibilities; high sheriff of his county in a time when practically all responsibility for law enforcement rested in his hands; representative to the legislature at the age of 23; 6 years a member of the Senate of Maine; chairman of the State highway commission during my administration as Governor of Maine; 4 years a member of the Governor's council, a position second only in importance and responsibility to the office of Governor in Maine; completing now 4 years of service in the Congress of the United States.

In each of these positions he labored without ceasing, and each laid the foundation for a further broadening of his service that brought him finally to represent his congressional district here in the Capitol of the most powerful Nation the world has ever seen.

Yet this constant succession of honors revealing the continued confidence of his fellow citizens of all degrees left him untouched and unspoiled by the sometimes corroding compliment of success.

His heart was still with the great number of people in humble circumstances with whom he loved to live.

As a fellow member of the Maine Senate in 1923 I heard our colleague deliver one of the great speeches of a century in the Maine Senate in behalf of his proposal for old-age pensions in a period when this topic was scarcely thought of by the great mass of his fellowmen. When that speech was finished, prophetic in its vision, there was not a single dry eye in the chamber nor a single dissenting vote.

A decade later, when challenge was made as to his position on old-age pensions, it was my privilege to use that historic address as an entirely adequate reply.

As an executive and a legislator alike he brought to his work the most detailed and unremitting attention that undoubtedly contributed to his untimely end.

As a lifelong champion of good roads he had the satisfaction of seeing his legislative plans reach fruition under his administration as chairman of the highway commission and Maine roads become one of the chief cornerstones in the development of our State.

But in later life, in the problems of labor, his talents and his interests found their fullest scope. Coming to Congress, his lifelong record of service to the interests of labor and industry alike gave him the unique distinction of being endorsed for a position on the highly responsible Committee on Labor of the House by both the Maine State Federation of Labor and the Associated Industries of Maine.

In the 4 years of his service the Committee on Labor became the center of the most heated controversies in each session. Always Representative SMITH was found in the midst of the battle, seeking, in his strategic position on subcommittees dealing with these contentious issues—a position accorded him by the confidence of his colleagues on both sides—to adjust and harmonize the issues in the interest of both his State of Maine, to which he recognized a primary allegiance, and the cause of American industrial progress, in which he believed was bound up the hope not only of labor and capital in America but the hope of humanitarian progress throughout the world.

Many of his labors bore fruit in adjustments in legislation that meant much to New England and to labor and industry everywhere. On other problems he was still at work with high hope that he would find a solution that was just and helpful to all alike.

His untimely end was clearly a result of his unceasing labors far beyond his strength.

A host of friends in Congress and in Maine will be deeply saddened by his passing as they will be inspired by his life.

MICHIGAN APPLES

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, in order that the country may know that we not only produce the finest automobiles in the world in the State of Michigan, and about 80 percent of all the automobiles produced in this world, I have placed in the cloakrooms today—both the Republican and Democratic cloakrooms—samples of some of the finest apples produced in this world. They were produced in the Seventeenth Congressional District of Michigan, which I have the honor to represent. We have had samples of various kinds of fruit—oranges, grapefruit, pineapples—pies, shrimp, and fish, and each Member has delighted in showing to the country the excellence of the things produced in his district. The two varieties provided are the Northern Spys and Delicious. These apples may not show to the best advantage at this late season of the year; they may not have the richness of color of the apples raised on irrigated land in the great Northwest, but in point of quality of flavor they are unexcelled by any apples produced anywhere on earth. My colleagues, I ask you to join me in helping yourselves to them. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make two insertions in the RECORD, first, a radio address I delivered last night over a national network from station WOL on Americanism, and, second, a statement I am making today before the Committee on Flood Control.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs may be permitted to sit during the session of the House today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the Appendix of the RECORD an article in the Springfield Republican written by Hon. Joseph A. Conry, a former Member of Congress from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein quotations from two letters and from the Washington Post.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an editorial from the Milwaukee Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House gave consent for me to place in the RECORD a statement showing the cost of production of milk in the Detroit milk shed. I am advised by the Superintendent of the Government Printing Office that this material will require three pages of the RECORD, and therefore, under the rules, it is necessary for me to obtain additional consent, if I may do so, to insert this matter in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the material?

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is a cost study on the production of milk in the Detroit milk shed, which covers several counties in Michigan. I believe it will be valuable information for the Members of the House who are interested in milk products primarily, because it is an unusual study. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert this material in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

GOOD BEHAVIOR TENURE BILL FOR FEDERAL JUDGES

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the committee——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, by consent of the gentleman from Georgia, I am permitted to request the privilege of making a suggestion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Everyone will agree, I am sure, that this bill is one of the most important bills we will consider. The debate on the bill is to be concluded in 2 hours, and my suggestion is that the Members of the House try to remain in attendance during that time in order that they may understand this important measure which is to be considered.

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. COX. Certainly.

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has referred to the fact that this is a very important matter, and for that reason the Members should remain on the floor. For this reason also we should have more time to debate this question. One hour is not enough on this bill. I am flooded with requests for time and I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended to 2 hours on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule has not been presented. The rule could be amended if the House desires to do so.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 237 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 237

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 5939, a bill to provide for trials of and judgments upon the issue of good behavior in the case of certain Federal judges. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, in view of the feeling that prevails on both sides of the aisle with respect to time for debate, I ask unanimous consent that the rule be amended to provide for general debate of 2 hours instead of 1.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

This is a bill making in order the so-called good-conduct bill reported by the Judiciary Committee.

I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS], is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, before beginning to discuss this most important and wise piece of legislation, a manifestation of the real statesmanship of the author of the bill, please permit a tribute to him who is considered one of the major prophets of constitutional law in this Nation—yea, in the world today—the gentleman from Texas, the Honorable HATTON W. SUMNERS. [Applause.]

Many of us love the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. All have the utmost confidence in his legal opinion on any subject. He is the only man who has ever lived who participated in as many as three impeachment trials before the Senate of the United States. Possessed of a wealth of thinking power and absolute integrity of thought out of the incomparable richness of his experience, the gentleman from Texas, HATTON SUMNERS, takes the floor today and leads the fight for the passage of this bill a second time. Essentially, the same bill was passed by the House of Representatives in 1937.

The passage of this bill would not change one jot or tittle of the law of impeachment. Not if we would, could we. We would not if we could.

No part of the power of this House will be taken away or diminished when this bill becomes law. The same deliberation must be a condition precedent to this mode of procedure that is necessary in impeachment. But, by this new mode of accomplishing the same result, after a complaint has been made by a responsible person, and after the Judiciary Committee has weighed it on the scale of its judgment with the utmost of its scrupulous care, it will then report to the House which of the two roads is, in its opinion, indicated as the better.

Then the House has the choice between the two roads of trial, before the Senate or before a special court. Or, of course, the House may decide to take neither road.

Impeachment is a ponderous procedure. It is a mechanism so unwieldy that it has probably not been used as often as it should have been, and because of its inherent defects it has repeatedly failed. Impeachment is a 16-inch gun. A gun of that size is not needed to shoot the twig from under a sparrow. We laboriously load this Big Bertha. Occasionally it is fired. After many shots have failed, once in a while a twig falls. But, such a big gun is unnecessary and a waste of time, effort, and ammunition. This bill provides a better way—a smaller gun with a surer aim.

Is the removal of a judge who has disgraced his bench of such moment to the Nation that the usual functions of the Senate and Senators should be paralyzed for weeks? Is it necessary that we spend from five hundred to a thousand dollars per witness to bring them across the continent, as we did in the Louderback case? Or shall three judges be designated to go where the judge sits and there try the case and dispose of it in an orderly and expeditious manner?

The first great reason for the enactment of this bill is for the sake of the bench; for the sake of the men who are now adorning "the woolsack" and who lend glory to the administration of justice. Not one in a hundred judges have ever disgraced themselves, or their office or brought administration of justice into disrepute. For those honored judges, the ninety and nine, we plead for the enactment of this bill. We need a more expeditious, a more certain remedy than that which is provided by the impeachment power. In all the history of the American Nation there has been only one conviction of a United States district judge in a contested impeachment trial. One hundred and fifty years are gone, and with all the hundreds of complaints that have been registered in that time only 12 impeachment trials have been ordered by this House. There have been two convictions of judges in contested cases, one a judge of the commerce court and the other a district judge. Another resigned under fire.

Does this bill imply criticism of the Senate? No; certainly not. That august body has measured up splendidly under the handicaps with which it has contended. It has done as much of its duty as those men who have always been worthy to sit in the seats of the mighty have been able to perform, as beset as they are with public business and their multifarious official duties. This bill might well be entitled "For the relief of the Senate." The Senators need the relief which this bill gives them. When the Constitution was written, that body had only 26 Members. There were only 15 district judges in the United States. Now we have 96 Senators and some 160 United States district judges. When the impeachment power was written into our Constitution, each district judge loomed large on the national horizon because they were few. Now they are lost in the crowd, so to speak.

CONSTITUTIONALITY

The most serious argument advanced against the constitutionality of this bill is expressio unius, exclusio est alterius. From this Latin maxim opponents argue that because the impeachment power provides a mode of removing a judge and no other mode is expressly set forth in the Constitution no other mode may be provided by law. In other words, the expression of the one excludes all others. The Constitution has this and nothing more to say on the subject of impeachment:

> The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment.
> The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments.
> The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors.

That is all. There is no hint that judicial ouster is interdicted. In fact, the impeachment power and all provisions relating thereto are found in articles I and II of the Constitution, which are separate and distinct from article III, which deals with judicial power and prescribes that "the judges of both the Supreme Court and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior."

There are five reasons why the maxim expressio unius, exclusio est alterius can have no application whatever to this bill:

1. STARE DECISIS, CONTRA

The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly decided that the expression in the Constitution of the impeachment power over all civil officers did not exclude the removal from office of civil officers by other means. These decisions fall into three classes. None of them relate to the removal of judges, for the removal of no judge has ever been attempted by any other way than impeachment, because there has never been any law for such a procedure. We are trying to pass such an enabling act now. Mark you, "all civil officers" means "all." It means all civil officers, including judges. There is no special reference to judges in either article I or article II. Article II, section 4, says "all civil officers" shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors. Therefore, if any civil officer is excepted from its operation, all must be excepted. Civil officers appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, are removable by the President alone—Myers v. United States (272 U. S. 52, 57); Wallace v. United States (257 U. S. 541); Shurtleff v. United States (189 U. S. 311, at 317); Parsons v. United States (167 U. S. 324); Blake v. United States (103 U. S. 227).

The following quotation from the Shurtleff case is quite in point:

> By the fourth section of article II of the Constitution, it is provided that all civil officers shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. No one has ever supposed that the effect of this section was to prevent their removal for other causes deemed sufficient by the President. No such inference could be reasonably drawn from such language.

Quoting again from the same case, page 316:

> The maxim, expressio unius est exclusio alterius, is used as an illustration of the principle upon which the contention is founded. We are of opinion that thus used the maxim does not justify the contention of the appellant. We regard it as inapplicable to the facts herein. The right of removal would exist if the statute had not contained a word upon the subject.

The second class of cases involving civil officers are unanimous in their holding that the heads of departments have the implied power of removal of their own appointees. Typical of this class of cases are United States v. Perkins (116 U. S. 483) and Keim v. United States (177 U. S. 290).

The third class of cases involving civil officers and their removal are unanimous in holding that courts of law have implied power of removal of all of their appointees. Typical of this class of cases are Ex parte Hennen (30 U. S. (13 Pet.) 230); Regan v. United States (182 U. S. 419). Therefore, inasmuch as these nine cases, in three different categories or classes, have held that certain civil officers are subject to removal otherwise than by impeachment, it cannot be held that article II, section 4, of the Constitution means that impeachment is the only mode of removal of civil officers. And that is the only section that applies to judges with respect to the claimed expression of the one excluding the other.

2. HAD THE FRAMERS OF THE CONSTITUTION INTENDED TO GRANT EXCLUSIVE POWER TO REMOVE CIVIL OFFICERS VIA IMPEACHMENT, THEY WOULD HAVE SAID SO

Why did they not use the word "remove" or "removal" instead of the word "impeach" or "impeachment"? Certainly they knew words and how to use them. They were the greatest minds of the age and they were thoroughly familiar with British precedents and British law. The impeachment proceeding was well known. The Hastings case was in its final throes at the time of the adoption of our Constitution. There had been no change in impeachment law in the world in the last century preceding the adoption of our Constitution. It was well known and definitely fixed in all of its aspects. So, if the framers had meant to establish an exclusive mode of removal of civil officers from office, they would have said so.

3. THE MAXIM HAS NO APPLICATION TO AN EXPRESS PROVISION SELECTING ONE OF SEVERAL COMMON-LAW REMEDIES

The common-law ouster proceedings in England, which were known to every member of our Constitutional Convention, were: First, three types of legislative removal—the bill of attainder which is specifically outlawed in our Constitution; second, impeachment, which we adopted almost literally, minus their punishment provisions; and third, an address to the Crown, joined in by both the House of Lords and House of Commons. That fails here, of course, because we have no crown and, therefore, no possibility of an address to the crown; for the crown is not in this sense even remotely akin to the office of President. The second type of removal was executive. Removal by the Crown of those who held their positions under his patent, which read, "for the pleasure of the King." Hence, of course, the King had that power over his own patentees. Our President has and exercises much the same power over his appointees.

The third class of removals in Great Britain were the judicial removals—scire facias, in the King's bench, limited to the judges of higher courts, and quo warranto, for the removal of the lower strata of judges.

So all that the framers did in writing the impeachment provisions of our Constitution was to select one out of the five existent and used methods of removal employed in England. Their common law became the law of America, and only by limitation of use and by failure to use have these other methods of removal—which are still available in England—fallen into disuse in this country, and possibly into extinction because of nonuse.

4. WITHOUT AN EXPRESS PROVISION, IMPEACHMENT WOULD HAVE BEEN IMPLIEDLY PROHIBITED BY THE DOCTRINE OF SEPARATION OF POWERS

The reason the impeachment power was written into our Constitution was that without an express provision granting that power to the legislative branch of our Government that branch would have had no right to control or to attempt to control the judicial or executive branch, even in this single respect.

The case of Humphrey's Executor v. United States (295 U. S. 602) supports that proposition. Humphrey was a man who occupied a quasi judicial as well as quasi legislative position, a member of the Federal Trade Commission. This body is not within the Executive Department, and must be free from executive control. To show that the doctrine of separation of powers is still a living force, the following quotation from pages 629 and 630 of the Humphrey decision is made:

> The fundamental necessity of maintaining each of the three general departments of government entirely free from the control or coercive influence, direct or indirect, of either of the others, has often been stressed, and is hardly open to serious question. So much is implied in the very fact of the separation of the powers of the departments by the Constitution; and in the rule which recognizes their essential coequality. The sound application of a principle that makes one master in his own house precludes him from imposing his control in the house of another who is master there. James Wilson, one of the framers of the Constitution and a former Justice of this Court, said that the independence of each department required that its proceedings "should be free from the remotest influence, direct or indirect, of either of the other two powers."

The main purpose of writing impeachment power into the Constitution was to supply a check in the legislative branch of our Government against the Executive, and also over the judiciary, to the extent of that impeachment power. If that was the purpose, the power must have been granted in express terms, else it would have been impliedly prohibited by reason of the clear enunciation and understanding of our theory, doctrine and practice of separation of powers among three equal and coordinate branches of our Government.

5. THE FRAMERS DID NOT WISH TO MAKE EXECUTIVE AND JUDICIAL OFFICERS COMPLETELY DEPENDENT UPON CONGRESS

They wanted to give the legislative branch a check against the other two departments, but they did not wish to make the legislative branch supreme and completely dominant. They wished to confer a power of removal by impeachment, but the desired limitations on the right to punish had to be explicitly stated. If they had conferred the full power of impeachment, it would have carried with it the right to inflict the punishments imposed in impeachment trials in England. So, desiring to limit the legislative branch of our Government in the exercise of the power of impeachment they said: "But you cannot go beyond the punishment of ouster and future disqualification to hold office." In other words, they wished to give one independent branch of the Government a limited, supervisory control over the others, but not the right to hang, draw, and quarter.

TRIAL BY JURY

Another question as to the constitutionality of this bill is that it denies to the accused the right of trial by jury.

What are the constitutional guaranties of trial by jury?

> The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury (art. III, sec. 2).
> In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed. * * * (Sixth amendment.)
> In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved (seventh amendment).

Impeachment in England was a criminal prosecution, for in addition to removal from office punishments including fines, forfeitures of estates, and even hanging, drawing, and quartering could be inflicted. But when the impeachment power was written into our Constitution it was specifically provided that:

> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law (art. I, sec. 3).

So it is apparent that from the beginning of the power in this country all criminal elements were removed from the impeachment proceeding. In fact, it was specifically provided that for any crimes of which the accused might have been guilty, he could be prosecuted under the criminal law in addition to and wholly separate from any impeachment proceeding that might be brought against him. Ex parte Milligan (4 Wall. 2).

Aside from criminal prosecutions the constitutional guaranty of trial by jury extends only to suits at common law. Therefore, as proceedings to remove an incumbent from his office in the absence of other punishment than ouster and future disqualification cannot be said to be criminal prosecutions, the only question remaining is, Is a civil ouster suit a suit at common law?

"Suits at common law" was a phrase, the meaning of which was clearly known to the framers of our Constitution, and each of the common-law suits was also well known. Assumpsit, detinue, replevin, action on the case, and the others were as familiar as the A B C's. All of them, including scire facias and quo warranto were triable by jury in England because there, an office was held by the courts to confer contractual and property rights. But in the United States, except in one State, this doctrine has never found any favor whatsoever. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Crenshaw v. United States (134 U. S. 99) has given as clear an expression to the American view as could be wished:

> Public office is a public trust, which confers as against the Government no contract or property rights.

For many years trial by jury has been unknown in the United States in scire facias and in quo warranto actions. Neither of these actions has ever been used here for the removal of any judge. Neither can now be so used.

The trial of the justiciable issue of good behavior, vel non, provided for in the pending bill, was utterly unknown to the common law. By no stretch of the imagination, therefore, can it be said to be included within our constitutional guaranty of trial by jury. It is entirely new, and the Congress in creating it has unquestionable right to make it triable by the court, without a jury.

The power granted by implication in article III of the Constitution is nonetheless potent because it has lain dormant, awaiting this enabling act to implement it. The right, of removal of Federal judges under it is to be vitalized by the passage of the pending bill. Such a procedure has never been possible before, hence, there are no court decisions with reference to the exercise of it by Federal authority. But substantially the same thing has been done by States, and not only the State courts but the Supreme Court of the United States have upheld the procedure and ruled that it squares with the requirements of due process of law and all other provisions of the fourteenth amendment, and that—

Nothing in that amendment was intended to secure a jury trial in a case of this nature (Wilson v. North Carolina, 1069 U. S. 586, at 594).

In the proceedings for trying the right to office in the case of Kennard v. Louisiana (92 U. S. 480), the statute provided for a hearing without a jury, and the Supreme Court of the United States held it was not objectionable for that reason.

In Foster v. Kansas (112 U. S. 201), the Kennard case was approved.

So, by clear analogy, the procedure provided in this bill, including the stipulation that the trial shall be by the court rather than by jury has been approved by the Supreme Court.

Having disposed of the only two bases for questioning of the constitutionality of this bill, let us consider the dormant power implicit in article III of the Constitution. If every word relating to impeachment were stricken from the Constitution, we would still have section 1 of article III. This stands by itself, completely separated from articles I and II—

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges of both the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior.

It cannot be held by any stretch of the words or by any stretch of the imagination that this means that judges are to hold office for life. They are to hold office only during good behavior. Who is to say whether or not a judge has failed to maintain such demeanor and thereby forfeited his right to continue in office? This bill is founded upon the bedrock principle that good behavior, vel non, is a justiciable issue which a court would be fully qualified to determine if so authorized by appropriate enabling legislation. The passage of this bill would provide just that.

This legislation will give assurance of an even better judiciary. It will increase the respect of the Nation for its courts. It will tend to preserve and improve our democracy. Justice must be kept pure. The spring from which the stream of justice flows must not be even slightly contaminated. All men should be able confidently to drink therefrom, tasting the sweetness of its purity, while slaking the thirst of their souls for the essence of truth, for righteousness saturated with mercy.

Statesmen will give this measure their most serious consideration. It challenges to the long view, the high view. Opportunity knocks at our door today. We have a chance to strike a blow for the salvation of the soul of our institutions and the administration of justice. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I am very happy indeed to concur in what my colleague the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS] has said about the ability and the character of our chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]; but I am not willing to concede that all wisdom and all knowledge is wrapped up in the intellect of one individual. While I am very happy to, and usually do, follow the gentleman from Texas on purely legal problems, I feel that I would be doing myself and the House an injustice if I were to let my love and affection for our chairman lead me astray when I feel that a great constitutional question is involved. I agree with some of the things the gentleman from Alabama has said with reference to jury trials. He devoted much of his time debating whether or not a jury trial was necessary in this new-fangled ouster proceeding. I concede—yes, I contend—that if the Congress has the constitutional right to adopt a method other than impeachment of removing judges or civil officers, then it has the right to provide the type of court—one judge or more, a jury or no jury. I do not agree with the gentleman from Alabama that any such right exists. If you follow his words, if not his logic, then if the Congress has the right to provide another method of removal of judges, it has that same right to name another method for removal of the President, the Vice President, and all other "civil officers" under the Constitution.

In my remarks I am not going to quote any Latin; I am not going to cite any court cases. I believe the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS] was correct, when in debate on a similar bill before the House 2 years ago, he said that there was no law other than the Constitution on this proposition. In substance, he said: "We are pioneers, we have no guide posts. We are blazing a new trail, and it was our illustrious chairman who has discovered this new remedy." Today the gentleman from Alabama brought in a wealth of legal lore. He cited a lot of cases having to do with the removal of postmasters, like the Meyers case, and the removal of incumbents from other similar administrative offices. The law books may be impressive and no doubt he called attention to some good law. The difficulty is that the court decisions to which he refers are not germane to the issue we are now considering. I do not believe that this irrelevant law will have much effect on the House. This is not the proverbial justice of the peace court where the court visualizes rather than digests.

There is a minority report signed by six members of the Judiciary Committee—and, believe me, Mr. Speaker, it would be much easier to go along with our good chairman. I am sure that every member of the committee who signed the minority report, takes the position he does because he sincerely believes this act unconstitutional and ill-advised.

The purpose of this bill is to provide an additional method of removing from office certain—not all—Federal judges.

The Congress can be engaged in no more serious or fundamental work than the impeachment or removal from office of the judiciary. The importance of the task warrants deliberation and solemnity of treatment. As we approach the consideration of this measure two questions necessarily present themselves.

First, has the Congress the constitutional power to do that which is contemplated?

Second, is the policy embarked upon in this bill desirable and advisable?

In reaching an answer to the first question it is well that we have before us the pertinent provisions of the Constitution, which are as follows:

Section 2 of article I of the Constitution provides that—

The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment.

Section 3 of article I provides that—

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachements.

Section 4 of article II provides that—

The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

Section 1 of article III provides that—

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior.

As said by the gentleman from Alabama in debate 2 years ago, all the law on the subject is right here in the Constitution. It is no place else. It is not in the Supreme Court decisions he has cited today.

It is conceded by the proponents of this bill that section 4 of article II, which provides for the impeachment of the Federal judiciary, cannot in any way be changed by congressional action without constitutional amendment. Therefore the Federal judges are civil officers within the meaning of the Constitution and removable by impeachment only. Regardless of any legislation enacted by Congress, the right to try Federal judges impeached in the House remains in the Senate. That is admitted.

It is the contention, however, that section 1 of article III limits the tenure of office of the Federal judiciary to a term "during good behavior," and that article III has no relation whatever to section 4 of article II, but that in the judicial section another method is provided for removing these civil officers. The chairman of the committee says "this is to be a suit by the United States against a judge for violating the conditions of his contract," and that the question of good behavior is a justiciable issue and, therefore, can be tried and disposed of by the judiciary.

This bill goes so far as to provide that the prosecution shall be by the Attorney General, the legal arm of the executive department, and shall be before a court selected by the Chief Justice, who is appointed by the Executive, from the circuit court of appeals. The most appealing thing about this proposal is its novelty. At best it is a sacrifice of fundamentals to expediency.

In view of what actually happened in the Constitutional Convention, I find no warrant for the conclusion reached by the advocates of this bill.

Alexander Hamilton, one of the framers of the Constitution, in the Federalist—No. LXXIX—speaking about the judiciary, wrote:

> This independence of judges is equally requisite to guard the Constitution and the rights of individuals. * * * The precautions for their responsibility are comprised in the article respecting impeachments. They are liable to be impeached for malconduct by the House of Representatives and tried by the Senate, and if convicted may be dismissed from office and disqualified from holding any other. This is the only provision on the point which is consistent with the necessary independence of the judicial character, and is the only one which I find in our own Constitution in respect to our own judges.

I doubt not that further evidence will be produced today indicating that the Constitutional Convention intended that judges should be removed by impeachment only, and had no idea that 150 years after the adoption of the Constitution, in the name of expediency, a microscopic examination of the Constitution would bring to light a hidden power, always present but never visible, whereby a short cut might be adopted to remove from the judiciary members whose conduct was other than good.

If this were a new question, that would be different; but the master legal minds for more than a century and a half have given study to the same proposition, and up to this time none have been bold enough to contend that this type of legislation is constitutional.

A well-established practice, based upon precedent, is now available as a guide in the trial of impeachment cases in the Senate. There is no difficulty in understanding what treason or bribery comprehend, but there once was a question as to whether or not behavior other than good behavior constitutes high misdemeanors within the meaning of section 4 of article II. This question, however, has finally been settled, as expressed by the late Chief Justice Taft, speaking before the American Bar Association in 1913, when he said:

> Under authoritative construction by the highest court of impeachment, the Senate of the United States, a high misdemeanor for which a judge may be removed is misconduct involving bad faith or wantonness or recklessness in his judicial actions, or in the use of his official influence for ulterior purposes. By the liberal interpretation of the term "high misdemeanor" which the Senate has given there is now no difficulty in securing the removal of a judge for any reason that shows him unfit.

It seems strange that the late Chief Justice, in his study of the Constitution in connection with the removal of Federal judges for misbehavior, overlooked this power which is here proclaimed, and which the gentleman from Texas has so recently discovered.

There is another thing that makes this procedure impossible to me. Section 1 of article III provides that:

> The judges, both of the Supreme and the inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior.

I repeat this language to call your attention to the fact that the Supreme Court and the inferior courts are treated as a class and as a group. Even though the Congress has the right to establish some new tribunal to try the justiciable question of good behavior. Certainly the Constitution does not give the Congress the power to set up one type of tribunal to try district judges, another type to try circuit judges, and another type to try Supreme judges. It takes all of these judges to compose the Federal judiciary. Any one of them may be impeached under the Constitution. That is, the Constitution provides like treatment for all of them when it comes to ouster proceedings. If the Congress has the power to set up this new court provided for in this bill, then it has unlimited power and discretion so far as setting up different tribunals, boards, and different courts to provide for the ouster and dismissal of all Federal judges regardless of whether they are Supreme Court judges or United States district court judges.

In all the past 150 years only 12 impeachments have been voted by this House against judges, and only two convictions have been had in the greatest Court of Impeachment in the Senate. We may complain because the Senate does not convict. But let us take the last two or three cases where the judges were impeached in the House by a small majority. This House itself was divided as to whether or not there was even reasonable cause to try the judges. The cases went to the Senate, and only 2 out of 12 were convicted. If we have judges on the bench who should be removed, as suggested by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS], it is my privilege, it is your privilege, it is my duty, and it is your duty, if we know of such, to come upon the floor of the House and make our charges known. Then it is the privilege and the duty of this House under the Constitution to determine whether or not reasonable cause has been shown to believe that the things charged are true. If there is just and reasonable cause, then the House votes the impeachment, and the case goes to trial in the Senate, as provided in the basic law of the land. We already have sufficient remedy. This is no time to be tinkering with the courts. We should respect the law and not try to circumvent it.

Bear in mind that no definition of good behavior is to be found in this bill, and its proponents will refuse to accept any amendments attempting to set up any standards. Yet it is insisted that punishment shall be meted out to a judge whose conduct does not meet the approbation of the specific tribunal happening to be called to determine his case. If this same judge was charged with murder, embezzlement, or robbery, the statutes would define the crime. The court would have a yardstick or guidebook. Here all is left to the discretion of the particular forum operating on the particular judge. Is this reasonable or constitutional? If the Congress can do this, then it can create any partisan court it sees fit to try any judge. The forefathers never intended anything of the sort.

This procedure would make possible the simultaneous trials of two judges on exactly the same charges. One prosecuted by the House in the Senate, where a two-thirds vote would be required to convict. The other prosecuted by the Attorney General, tried in this new court without a jury and convicted by a majority of the court. The judge convicted in the Senate could be deprived from ever holding office again in addition to being removed from office. The judge convicted by the court could only be removed from office.

If it is desired to change the method of removing unworthy judges, let us follow the prescribed method and amend the Constitution. That is the right way. The country will resent an unlawful short cut, it matters not how well intended. There were those who attempted a "short circuit" to control the Supreme Court, but the people insisted on the constitutional formula being followed if the Court was to be changed. By the same token, the people will resent the passage of this bill now before us. The integrity of the three independent branches of our Government requires the defeat of this measure.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise with much trepidation to oppose a measure that is sponsored by the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. I hold him, as I know this House does, in the highest esteem, both as a man and as a lawyer; but I am impelled to speak against this measure because I have a sincere and a profound conviction that in passing this measure, if that should be done, the House of Representatives would violate the Constitution of the United States in a most important and perhaps most serious manner.

The Constitutional Convention, called in those days the Federal Convention, assembled in Philadelphia for the purpose of framing the structure of this Government, had under consideration many measures for the removal of both judicial and administrative officers. In the Virginia plan Governor Randolph suggested that there should be a trial by a court. Impeachment of national officers, his proposal provided, was to be a part of the jurisdiction of the judicial power of the Government. All sorts of variations on this proposal were considered and at times approved by subcommittees, and once by the whole committee, but finally rejected. How can it be said that this instrument, which lays down the framework of our Government and is the basis of all our rights, can now be changed by action of this one body, or by action of both bodies of the legislative branch?

The truth of the matter—and all lawyers know this and it is fundamental in the law—is that when the law speaks and provides one method it impliedly excludes all other methods. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. That is a well-known proposition of law. It applies to the Constitution, as well as to statute law.

Here we are asked to extend this power of impeachment to a court of circuit judges of the United States. This writing on the blackboard here states the law:

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments.
